Introduction

Laodicean with regard to almost every little thing which contributes to the stock wherewithal of our journalizing poetry, Ms. Coles's response is rather to elemental violence, even when it proceeds from mere mortals, relatives and lovers (those indispensable irrelevances), even when such violence is masked or belied. Yet we recognize these stark, staring poems most confidently when she acknowledges the depredations of sunlight, or the erasures of wind and water, the stars "keeping their violence at such a distance", and the mountains that

like courtship—the impulse to rise and the desire to fall
all the same motion.

This poet is likely enough in her apprehensions of the art—notice how suavely the closed form writhes in her hands in "The Suicides," and how cunningly she assumes the voices, the drastic presences of imagined or remembered others. Yet these are the least worldly of any new poems I know, the least entangled in the household bonds of life. How Rilke would have praised her for that, who so deplored his own mundane imbroglios—how readily he would have attached the final poem here, an icy, cauterizing "Love Poem for the Nuclear Age," to the Duino project! For Katharine Coles is desperately concerned to set her adorations—and we must read this word in all its original senses: to speak, to plead, to pray, and most originally, to pronounce a ritual formula—on the page with just enough salt or ice or vinegar to keep them crisp or distinct (her effort is to be in keeping, to be decorous, seldom to be decorative). They are not imperishable, such ecstasies, the poet knows as much from her own experiments with keeping, and so she goes about forming structures and figures which—for the most part irregular, sorrowing, variable—will stand as spectacular ruins (e.g. her signature poem, "Touring the Yucatan"). Adoration, in terms of the pervasive vehemence of the landscape Out West, is quite as easily phrased in terms of execration, the turnabout immaterial.

In such eager extremities, Ms. Coles repeatedly calls to mind certain religious women who have made their statements (their orations, then) as the trace of their enterprise rather than as its purpose or goal; women who like that Spanish saint required a certain fragmentation of the spirit before they could submit to its gale force; women who, in their wilderness of elemental havoc, would implore with Ms. Coles:

let every thing
given to guard me
fall through my fingers.

In such writing, the signs are always reversible, and only what is perceived as broken can be prophesied as whole; only what is castigated can be endured as joy; only what is jeopardized is free.

I.

A Room with a View

When the lake freezes across they drive out for miles, he said, Jeeps and old pick-ups loaded with saws, coolers, boxes of intricate tackle. They drop their lines right out the car windows.
The skaters, their bright sons, flash all afternoon over the inlets, and at last, made brave by motion and their own heat, dash for the center—only ice, snow coming on, dusk dulling the surface. He didn't tell it quite this way, and there is no lake here, where I look out, elbows on the sill.

But I imagine the music each radio gives, and the fish, slow, lifting toward the ice, their blood as cold as the water that buoys them.

Behind me, he bathes and serenades in his deepest voice.
I hold myself still—already his smallest word can wrench me open, as if it's our love that has finished or failed and the scene taken me. Pink neon, the Downtowner Bar flares across the glass, but beyond, I know, mountains

all the same motion. The men lean on their pick-up horns in symphony.
The boys tumble from the shadows and light snow and lift the creel lids, their dinners eyeing them coldly.

I want that lake as he saw it but I settle for my own view: headlights flash on and move toward the white shores and forests, toward the kitchens where women tie on aprons and test knives against their thumbs. One watches her face turn in the window and imagines in it a world before grief—her then careless body approaching violence, hands making her surface dance. Her fingers turn the knife—all the colors of silver, the scales lift; the pale flesh tears open. Her husband pats her as he passes, his touch almost absent—like the touch of the man who will walk out of the bath, turn on the light.

Come away from the window, he'll say, his hands on my waist. It's dark.
There's nothing to see.

Declension

I didn't touch him as we walked the garden's paths, fall, maples and the shrubbery in ruins, but you and my body have your own imaginations, so later I pulled the blinds against the thinning light, old men stuttering through the trash piled at curbside, hookers who shouted across the cement park or leaned into sedan windows, knelt at open car doors.

Infidelity, casual consent: that day, I believed that a man may look to a woman for everything—flesh, beyond flesh. He and I both had talk about love behind us: you, the one whose faith I broke for you, others who had broken us pushed aside for the moment.

Did you think I would never stray beyond your courtyard?
Sun, brick, almost buoyant impatiens and pale drinks, every face placid and tan under shifting leaves, a man bent to a pitcher of liquid, spinning ice. You recall only the moment you turned holding a full glass for me, and later the floral sheets folded down, cool, our bodies coming together languorous, almost abstracted. I could show you a home I've made apart but you believe in the life you keep for me in your quiet house, sure of what you wait for.

Oh, this wanderlust, cities' lights from the air unwinding like pinwheels. This new desire is more than I want, but I travel for it anyway.

On his nightstand, late pears, numbers luminous as signs.
Never has this hour, light closing down into evening, seemed so permanent, my body humming as if with his life, as if I could fold into his hands and let them coax any shape from me—a weightless arch, a long-necked bird with her head thrown back.

I thought there was little wrong with my life:
you kept at a distance, in a courtyard memory encloses in light. Except for what you and my body imagine, I have what I wanted. Solitude. Avocados growing dull on the sill.

But my heart makes this privacy suddenly imperfect, as if the birds that whistle and chuckle from the hedge had stopped to wait for some sign from me, and the house fell silent. I am tired of telephones, voices traveling too easily, as if any of us cared about speech now.

Distracted, we pick up anything to fill our hands—tall glasses, sweating, the pears or icy apples.

No more of this. I must stop believing

I can articulate my heart to you, this dumb muscle, bad company.

On the subway platform, he teaches me to juggle: apple, red army knife, apple again poised above the graffiti—you've seen this trick.

I am miles from any home. Not even you can discover me in the subterranean light, so on the train I sway into him and press the blade to the fruit, one bright surface giving to the other, the skin a clean spiral falling away.

Provisions

Hunting

The window over the bed left open. Half in sleep, I think I'm in the tent waking early. Father up already, his tin cup steaming.

The campfire a long bright moment in a morning all one color: pale sky, ground mist rising, husks of flowers and grass limned with frost. The city just a dream—lights rising, dark orchards all around.

Cultivation

A song or a joke. Dead skunk in the middle of. Why did the skunk cross? Out in the orchard, plodding from windfall to windfall, he felt this snow coming on. Tucked into one last apple. Looked to the highway, all its flash and whir and his dark den beyond.

On the shoulder, I teeter on dangerous party shoes.

The man driving me kneels in his best trousers and works his knife up under the skin. Draws it slow through the soft belly.

Gathering

November, and still there are roses. Not even black yet with frost. My neighbor's, not mine. I want to touch whatever catches my eye. Let everything

fall through my fingers. All summer I've watched them. How they don't resist. I keep thinking it's over but more push out and open and fall.

In the light from the high-beams he scrapes back the fur. Locates and trims off the scent glands.

Pulls the pelt up, the inch of winter fat reluctantly peeling.
He's never believed in waste. He shakes out the hide.

Folds it into the bag.
Scrubs his hands lightly in the snow. Walks back, touches my hair, tightens my scarf gently to my throat.

Thief. According to story the oldest profession: in the garden she must have begun by gathering flowers.

Then berries from brambles right at hand level. Then of one mind she reached for the ripe fruit just overhead, the apple's descent into gravity. Her mind was never so simple again. I lean to my neighbor's roses, their fragrance still more than I bargained for.

So we are late and cold. Orion wheels in his continuous hunt. Bright anyway in the sky.

Inside, candleflame

blurs into haloes on the steamed windows.
He goes to wash his hands again. I move in among the women under chandeliers.

Mirrors flash us back, red and emerald silks caught only for a moment in the glass, necklaces shining.

Light's delicate lines on our skin. The host squeezes my hands, scrapes his cheek over mine. The men shift in their dark suits or pause, caught by a word, a head lifting. Their hands move over our waists, shoulders—a sash, a lock of hair too neat or gone astray.

The city just a dream—
I move through the woods, my red hat, red parka blazing among the pines. Gunfire popping.

Limbs laden with the last red and yellow leaves flare in my arms, in the white air

as they will against my flat, white walls.
Miles away, my father, pocket lunch long gone, lifts his rifle. The doe lowers her head to the tree's tender bark.

Her body the only dream she's ever had—that and the body moving through hers heavy in spring as she works back to high country.

I edge toward the punchbowl.
The hostess follows with dips on a tray, little corncobs and mushrooms. She shows me the curios, her father's carved figures. Kenyan ivory going to yellow—the shapes of elephants, trunks raised, tusks carved in ebony, black against pale, stylized flesh. Her finger tracks the cuts and grooves.

In his absence, she says, she would arrange the figures on her nightstand. Drop to sleep among them, small and dangerous and afraid in the tall grasses.

Miles from camp he guts her. Leaves the entrails for someone else to read. He is hungry.

He imagines the doe hanging by her feet in the carport, himself and his friends gliding hunting knives over her, loving the feel of that serious business. Hide pulled away, she will be only smooth, her graceful swells and tucks mauve behind translucent membrane, the delicate lacing of fat.

Ripe fruit in the bowl. The end of the meat on the platter. After supper I walk the neighborhood.

The roses now really finishing. Twilight when I reach the orchards—all year I've taken branches in bloom, ripe and fallen fruit. Soon snow will cover everything—the ground, the branches—in half-dark like blossoms making their own light. So I close my hands on themselves, pocket the full harvest against the cold.

Arson

for L.M., 1959-1975

You were right. There's nothing sacred in our bodies, these houses decaying, neighborhoods let go to sag and ruin.
The trashbin must have smoldered all day on the back stair—afternoon of rain, smell of mold, wet earth—before the flame licked out the rear wall of the row houses, all now lit within, identical, walls blackening, sparks aloft over the bare yards. We drove slow past mothers and children in pajamas, huddled together, leaning on trees, cars, each other's shoulders, watching their porches list and one by one give in. You said you wanted to leave your flesh, the way the fire leaps rooftop to rooftop—did you really think there'd be another body waiting for you to burn?

Later in the garage, the car barely moving you, the exhaust rising to your head, you must have hoped your soul would lift, weightless and whole, from your body. We are years away, years past the drive down the flaming avenue.

You smiled and kissed each of us, walked inside, turned off the porch light.
The next morning in the halls at school we held against the day's lesson.
Our bodies could collapse on their own empty chambers, brilliant then dark.
I still wake from a street blazing on both sides, a tunnel of fire as far as the eye can see. I shift in bed or rise to the window for a sign night's lifting. Dark still hides the hand holding the match. It could strike anywhere, sputtering in cupped palms and flaring, the days burning down, the house consumed from within and myself at the curb in my thin gown, my face flickering in the flickering light.

My Mother's Lesson

In the car, she shifts down and leans to the wheel, in her throat rising scales the teacher will pull through her all morning. She enters her body's tentative music, her voice faltering upward: she wants to discover how some, in tune, work inward and bring out the notes joined as if they had always meant to gather into sound out of nothing. At a stoplight she looks around—a schoolyard gritty with snow, bare trees and wires, and on the corner a man she has not seen before, and a pistol shoulder-high, apparently trained on her blue silk scarf. Calm, she shifts, pulls through the unchanged red light and is gone, the man behind her now and his gun unchanged, still silent, the only explosion the one she sounds and re-sounds in her mind, and only, that—none of love's tensions or wounds between them, no jealousy, dissonant notes. An enigma. Blocks away, she glances back, drives on—nothing, she says, left to chance.

At her lesson, she starts, stumbles, and the metronome counts her beyond her own compromising rhythm and this is the best she's ever sung: abandoned to the rise, the dying fall, her voice loosens

a music she has always felt playing through her body's cadence. She carries one phrase so wide it presses her ribcage, opens her throat, climbs

into the sweet, dangerous air of release, her voice pushing past notes recklessly, reclaiming moment after free moment, exactly as they occur to her.

Father

I imagined all the bright lights I could for him—an old movie-set hotel, neon glaring on the wall at dusk, hat and tails laid out on the bed, his white gloves flashing. I embroidered handkerchiefs, dreamed him pressing them to the eyes of women unlike my mother, their bodies in the darkness white and flickering, or vivid in casinos where they turned their heads bright as birds whose plumage warns of bitter or dangerous flesh. His failure was in what he gave me—the trimmed suburban shrubbery, the swingset erected in the snow one Christmas—so I gave him low, black cars, told my friends how their curves glowed under streetlights. I lost myself in leather and furs, the upholstery where women laid back their heads laughing, their throats quivering and so white, so tender in the darkness I thought his touch would bruise them.
My friends turned their faces on my pillow and touched my hair, their eyes moist with love for the father I'd made, created whole from the midwestern boy who'd stepped blinking from his mother's schoolhouse into the fifties' regulated light. For him I wanted the drama of a heartbreak he had earned, one that had left him stranded in the life I knew he had built with such care, for me, sadness by accumulated, ordinary sadness.

Letter from a Friend on Her Anniversary

As always in fall I dream the house burns and I walk toward him all night through flaming rooms leaving you behind as if you were myself calling me back. Sometimes I sit with him all night on the lawn, watching the planets and remote stars keeping their violence at such a distance. We wait until daylight. Across the street, girls arrive in pairs for early service, their pale eyes still and wide, looking past us, past the church, away from this world, bright with longing.

They don't need to see how autumn burns their city, across the foothills, the horizon, the cold sky. This world is nothing to them.

They will never die. We pull down the last of the bottle and think perhaps we could sleep soon.

He touches my cheek, the bruises still rising as they did that night when I told you it doesn't matter.

Believe me, I don't shy from his hand. I wait for it to coax a blush, a bruise, blood where the skin gives. It's all the same in love. In the house, the drapes lift as in a breeze, our figures shadows of the flame. If I turned and ran what could I save? Only my body, dry tinder that catches for him. My good friend, for him, for the one right touch, I will lie to you. You know I have always been bad at my life, and that it is all I have.

Sex as a Trope

Down, hands flat to the earth, the loam she feeds and coaxes life from, she knows as if by sight what roots thicken below—carrots growing brilliant, potatoes, rich turnips. She wipes her hands on her shirrtails, goes in, takes a stiff brush to her nails, aching, packed with dirt. The rain arrives as predicted.

Light wavers like water through the potted herbs gone wild on her windowsill.

She pinches mint for tea, lays out her cup, the kettle on the burner. She will rock awhile by the window. Rain pushes at the glass like wasps on those chilly days in autumn.

The way, she thinks, a woman pushes herself against the surface of the world, as if it might open into shelter, a small, light place.

He tells her how the girl bent down her head, her sleeve and collar torn,

how she touched her eyelid, pushed almost shut and still darkening, touched her swollen lips, her whole face grown beyond itself to one she couldn't find her own in. He thinks she felt sorry for that stranger, reached her hand

to the mirror, a gesture all the comfort she had to offer. He says it was only what it was. A girl wept before the mirror.

She unbuttoned her blouse again for the camera. Hard, the lights revealed no more than they were meant to. A document, ways a touch can blossom.

He says the men spoke gently to her. Asked her to turn. Turn again.

They are used to the turns love takes. The woman wonders how long the bruises would show. How much longer every touch would hurt.

Gravity. Bodies come together and spin free, wheeling off into time's inexplicable curve.

Explicable, then. The universe as a loaf of bread rising.

But what's bread that can't be tasted, smelled coming out of the oven? Bonehead Astronomy, she remembers. Physics for the simple, who understand what they touch. Is it the future or the past that draws her from bed to window?
What's the difference, if it all curves back on itself?
Star bright, but the sky is full of stars tonight and she can't say which first caught her eye. Star light, it carries old news quickly, the message changing with distance, the speed of retreat.
Even the sun and earth, so intimate, miss each other again and again. Even the heavenly bodies fly apart as fast as they can.
Now, in her body rising separate into the night, or when she escapes her body in sleep, she likes this hurtling through space, this going away fast. Star bright. She sends her wish to all of them.

Remember a little torn-up garden. Shrubs laid bare, their clipped tops strewn on the walks. Everything cut and tied for autumn.
The grass widened out to a park, still green, and the birds hopped from sunlight to sunlight as if the late warmth meant summer might stay. The food was simple—thick bread, cheese, pears and the last grapes passed palm to fingertip, mouth to mouth.
Because of its gravity they took the world lightly, as the leaves had all summer, turning above the lawns and swept stones.
And suddenly the wind pulled them free—leaves spinning fast to the ground or lifting on intricate drafts.
Red, bright yellow, the air whirled with leaves, and they both turned spread-eagle on their backs, mouths open, glad for the fall.

He tells her he took his daughter to the carnival.
Vendors. The young

in their Saturday motley, bright and threadbare. The rides whirled, silly with lights and music.

For once he watched the men.
The women, as always, passed by as if in the distance, self-possessed. Their feet turned out gently, he says, in that way women's feet have, and their throats were damp in the heat. He wanted to reach out and touch their napes, just touch them where their hair clung in tendrils escaping those bright clasps—but as he said he was watching the men: they craned after the women; some would turn for a moment and walk backwards, watching.

He tells her they made noises. Growls low in their throats. Hoots.

Or just their mouths working, growing moist. The women—he'd never noticed before—looked at no one.

Or rather, they turned only their eyes now and again, as if asking directions, as if to catch glimpses of themselves.

She falls awake, clinging to the sheets, then climbs the long ladder back.

She dreams to get things right, and over with. Cold that spreads. Poison, dinner gone badly. Surrender to fire, fever, passion, all the same. To the touch of a stranger, the caress of one who loves her too much to let her escape, tonight, into dreams, or tomorrow into her own life. She wonders if it matters whose hands, another's or her own, carry her roughly into the night.

The end will come violent after all—if not in pain or wrenching light, or even in flames swelling her, then in her body surrendered to time as it's always been. It is everything to her, and nothing.

II.

Donna Julia's First Letter After Juan's Departure for Cadiz

Isabella, more and more I remember childhood and you lifting your petticoats under the arbor just to feel the sun on you. It is late summer.

We have finished our studies. The governess sleeps on the shaded bench surrounded by roses. Remember what happened next? By now, I know you have heard my story—even you, in the cloisters where I am going. My choice will end me there, near God and you, whom I've lied to.

My virtue was so easy all those years it was safe: a husband too old for much, my own body trained to forget itself.

And I had grown as good a shrew as any.

I will travel as far within the convent walls as he, as far as I ever did between my husband's house and Donna Inez's garden with its trellises, its fleshy hanging flowers. How she dangled before me that boy plumping into ripeness, his rich skin and delicate fingers like yours—even his eyes, coquette's eyes like yours, those fabulous lashes shading the danger.

A fan, a veil—what a flirt I could have made him!

It is bad manners for a woman to love too much, to lose to passion what helps her button her body in, button her whole self with steady fingers, bind up silk and lace, button after button, her head lowered, her lashes lowered over her eyes, working in perfect containment. Now I will walk in from the stifling sun to that labyrinth of cells, the stone walls everywhere cool and damp.

I will reach out to the stones' caress.
I will press my body against them, there in the cool, almost darkness of midday.

I will cultivate the habit, draw its folds down over my shoulders; bare and mobile all day under rough cloth my nipples will grow tender then raw with passion; I will know the feel of this flesh, the life I take in my own hands all night. Bella, and I will end well! When I finish this I am ready. I will write him on gilt-edged paper, with the seal I use for you—elle vous suit partout— the right lies about a woman's one love and passion, a lady's diminutive tragedy.

My last decorous act, which he may let go to whatever wind he pleases. Bella, no tears.

Not a Storytelling Family

In that old house she'd made over my mother would lean at the window, the kettle forgotten in her hand, and look east past the bluing mountains and all the wide-open plains to a street she'd once strolled down singing, swinging her arms, wishing she could stay.
I never asked what she'd lost—the childhood spent moving landscape to landscape: Jakarta's jungle, airy Costa Rica, Cuba in its vivid seas.
Even my father pulled her loose from an old city, almost familiar ghosts, declining gardens, cousins whose hands she'd finally touched.
By then she must have learned to walk away, not to hold anything and rub it, a charm repeated, polished from use like the tales my friends' parents and grandparents told—the whole cast, nodding, revised the evenings and bright, wrenching days, the years the world kept growing but the smells of woodsmoke and supper still called them home. Speaking, the tellers grew distant, perfect as their pasts, myths true in every version. My mother turned her face to the present, and I invented her life, how she and my father drove out of their old, industrial city and west to drift in all that space—prairies repeating for days, scorched brush, the sun glinting pale and dangerous off the Chevy's dusty fins. I saw them wind down through the mountains at last and step into our street, the row of white houses. Begonias flared on the shaded porches for years.

Like my friends' great-grandmothers, my mother sat down on her steps and swore she would never pack up again. I knew this story as if she had told it—how the water tasted in midwestern towns and countries my friends had never heard of, everything but what she must have most remembered, all left behind. I never said what I left to search for: the cities that had passed through her, her face exotic on the dirty waterfronts, village squares pale and hot at midday, cobble streets turned to dust at the edge of town.

I travel all the way back and touch my mother's arm. She starts, fills the kettle and lights the stove.

We pass the afternoon talking of food, the long days, what we carry into this moment, and the next. Anything but what she leaves as she turns away to set out the cups—the past and its growing, unmapped wilderness.

Sentimental

for my brothers

The rains will move in today.

We carry umbrellas into the sunlight, down paths we walked together as earnest children, longing to be grown and far away. At three we stroll again to chapel. Watch dust float through the bright bodies of saints glazing the windows.

Growing, we believed what we were told. Nothing could stay. Not love. Not any particular angle of sun, our own senses sure to fade, maybe before the world's certain turn from sense.

We move again in a wild light. This desert is so brilliant we return as if to our lives. But the scorpion's delicate manners make her stunned prey last for days. The creosote's poisonous roots insure it life and solitude. These names we remember from paradise: Bright Angel Trail, Garden of Eden. After each brief rain, ephemerals burst into exuberant life. Dark Angel, Devil's Garden, Fiery Furnace. Alone on foot, we have lost ourselves in mazes of canyons. We might have died of thirst.
We stay near camp and lie all morning on the rock, the sun burning through us, the sand-filled wind whipping our skin.

For years in gray coastal cities we tensed our shoulders and strode down illuminated avenues.
Doorways fell into shadow. Marquees darkened the bars where couples leaned close to talk below music, their breath tentative in each other's ears.
All night, engines and sirens, until neon dimmed in the puddles and store windows and the sky emerged flat, early light that recalled us, blinking gritty eyes, back to our own lives.

These are the names of our cities:
Los Alamos, Salt Lake City, Las Vegas, Saint George. Late afternoon, southwest winds brought storms and took them
Fat Boy, Diablo Canyon, Diablo, Galileo, Trinity. The city was safe. Mother sent us out to take the air and sun.
The brief rains we opened our mouths to.

In the desert, a woman stepped out to her porch. We didn't know this then.
We read it years later as history. She walked out, dried her hands on her apron, leaned on the rail and looked west over the desert, her hand shading her eyes against the lowering sun.
Soon the atmosphere would refract into red, violet. The colors of evening.

We were in school, the last hour, learning of light, its weight and substance, the particular waves it travels by. She stood there, lemonade in her hand. The ice cubes shrank fast in the heat. She had never believed it would be so white—brilliance taking the whole sky. For a moment she leaned toward it over the rail. She lost sight of the moon, risen early, opaque over the low hills. And the sun.

Nothing but that light she turned from, palms pressed to her eyes.

If we were near home, mother was calling us in, checking our faces, behind our ears, the hands we held open.

We are almost settled.
Our childhood house still perches on the hill, cool and familiar.
We listen to its lies.
The city pushes its old streets out beyond the cultivated trees.
The desert glitters. From my window we watch a cloud edge over the sun.
The cat on the sill twitches at birds settling the closest limbs. The feeder with its little sheltering eaves you leaned high out over the pavement to hang for me, your hands white-knuckled on the casement, will have to hold them. The sparrows gather.
We drink lemonade as their voices fade under rain's chipping at the glass.

We look sideways at each other's familiar profiles or into our palms while we talk.
What we see—of course we love it more than God does, who toys with the shifting planet's center, with the stars, their violent changes. Early this morning, we found our neighborhood almost as we'd left it. Brought in the milk bottles, newspapers. Found we were left our lives, altered so little we didn't notice, bent down and took them up again, gently, in our hands.

The Suicides

for Janet

The leaves have never flown so beautifully.
They lie on the canyon roads like light.
There is no getting at the truth of this matter—the season keeps vanishing into the cold air.

These friends insist on vanishing into the cold—like the season, they keep vanishing into the cold air.
So we are left behind, alone, to cherish all the friends who've vanished, leaving us cold.

This dizzying land, a city high in the air is left behind for us alone to cherish, all its ravaged, tree-lined neighborhoods.

This dizzying land, this city high in the air—
Fall's ravaged all our tree-lined neighborhoods and brought its flawed light to the houses.

in this empty room we used to love.
Such a flawed light falls on the house

So this has used our love, this empty room we tend all night, keeping the lights turned high.
It hurts to breathe, to look across the valley, so we turn away from the prospect;

keeping the lights turned high, we tend all night an error of faith we must forgive.

We can only turn away from the prospect where they've left everything so well done.

have never left everything so well done.
There's no getting at the truth of this matter.

Before Parting

Neither of us can guess if they'll hurry dusk along, those clouds that have loitered all afternoon over the rooftops. From our window the row of backyards appears, and one by one sparrows lift from the trees and abandon themselves to wind. No empty cupboard sends me out in this weather to market, but a restlessness, the storm, and your notion of apples completing the white bowl, candlelight adrift on their skins. On the table, only that lies between us, between our two knives parting the meat; and after dinner we watch every other moment the sky open into fragile light. For those short illuminations we hover near the window. We want each other to believe that distance can't change us.

The sparrows also rustle, nervous, returning to the eaves. When we pass them over each other's bodies, our hands hesitate as they never have, as if we considered for the first time what might happen to anything that leaves our fingers.

Kudzu

All along the highway in a deep southern light it reaches up over the eaves of houses bleached pearl-gray, over the fences where women gossip, sweating in flowered dresses, fanning themselves with straw fans though it's April and the dogwood blossoms still hover, pale and weightless, in the shade.
I tell myself this is charming—ease and decay, an imported vine taking hold like habit let loose: nails bitten to their bleeding quicks; the hands of a lover who lost months ago the loved body they still reach for all night; a woman driving just to drive, as if she could escape her own body and the cells going wild inside it, leaving room for less and less of her life. Each house is dying in the rich, failing light. The women step back inside, tie towels around their waists, light their ovens, clean the fish and greens.

Their husbands come in laughing, and tonight will touch them in ways that won't hurt. They don't doubt what they know. I want to live in a small, falling house, to walk down the highway on Sundays, heat pounding through me, and stand with a hymnal in vine-filtered light and sing hymns I barely remember about not knowing how to leave the world, about wanting just to rise toward some unimaginable beginning.

Candles and lilies, approximate joy. A prayer for the stuttering boy who hanged himself in his barn, believing he'd ascend to God articulate, whole.
Sometimes we just cut out what is wrong.
The bruise from a pear. The potato's dark eyes.
The kudzu keeps growing back wilder.
The women thread their needles by lamplight to mend what they can in their houses of leaves.

Demeter

I'm not waiting anymore. Not waiting for anyone. This is my creation, as much as the barley or the silver wheat, harvest, my face in the steamed window fading. All this time

I've watched the earth die into itself, this wind that knows me. And under a high sky birds knot and release themselves to another season, shadows pulling over the brief lawns.

So they live in a world grown small—always, somewhere, the earth pushes into green for them.

Their wings slacken, fold under the weight of summer and all that brilliance: scarlet throat and flower, green, the mobile, yellow eye. And I am small, like this valley

I color crystal, too fragile, the people say, for their bodies' burdens. They dream of traveling light from the dying land, now there's nothing to wait for, now they have wings and go where the sun goes. They lie in red and yellow dresses, lift their faces to the heat. This is true no matter what season. They fly and land among strange trees that remind them by different green leaves of home. This afternoon two deer browse my yard, work the grass, my finished garden, as they would grass rising thin in the snow laid over the foothills.

The travelers grow restless and dull and come back to the cold. No exile—the land can't love one person that much any more. Ice under the eaves takes familiar shapes, changeable. The wind comes like spring to another country—houses for months snowed in all the way to the rooftops, another kind of exile. Hills darken behind me. Not waiting. I look out, poised on the edge. The deer, tender, pull twigs from the shrubs, flowers gone brittle, with care. All as is. It will move me at least this long.

Touring the Yucatan

The sun turning overhead. The earth in balance. We climb the pyramid, counting, hands on the steps above.

We don't look down. The guide goes ahead, for us inventing history. We try to recall the priest lifting a heart to the sky, the blood still moving it. Young girls, their eyes black with botanical visions, lying back in the sacred waters. We each feel that give, the decline into pleasure. Dizzy, we close our eyes.

We stop in the village.
Children run up selling Chiclets, panamas we touch absently and pass by.

A girl leads us to the veranda, brings iced drinks.

Plastic little birds perch on the glasses.
All around, birds chuckle, flutter the branches, their heads glowing bright from the shadows, as if they agree this world will do for us.

We raise our glasses, pleased with them.

With how we transform what pains us. The birdsong comes as if from a distance, cool, almost nostalgic.

Running hard, I leave the road.
The path, rough, forcechipped from the hard ground, leads into the jungle. Stones jut up.

Trees close around, woven together above

by lianas thick as my arm.
In front of me, a dog snarls, bares his teeth. I bend for a stone, the gesture alone turning him back into the jungle, to the man I didn't see before. He wears just the green of the shadow the air casts under the trees.

He smokes. Holds his rifle loose under his arm.

We watch each other: all I know. He raises the rifle, points it down the path behind me, the way out.

Workers hack at the roots, sinewy vines. Recover temples, statues of gods reclining or at war, the sacred rooms where women pushed kings out into the mysteries of water, sky, their first breaths, their bodies.
The stones are replaced one by one. Blue flowers still come up between them. In the wind the blossoms whirl, pulling hard at their stems.

Equinox. Down
the pyramid's stone steps, light snakes, a string of diamonds.
Now, we believe this. The earth poises straight on its axis then evening.
The snake pulls back stair by stair. Twilight falls through the varied tiers of leaves. We want to know how they came to know light so intimately. How many gave up their vision, approaching with eyes lifted up that burning, godlike face.

Love Poem for the Nuclear Age Utah, 1950—[]

"The sky is burning. I am shaking with cold."

Petrarch

Just the kind of disaster we can't quite imagine though we believe we can—the city caught in a mirror so empty it makes us tremble: only the window behind and the lights coming on to waver across the valley.
I sit, combing my hair, and look on from the edge at a vast, silvered surface.

Think, for example, of poems of the fifties written about eroding Italian fountains—smoking hard, posing to fit in, an American poet leaned propped under any frieze.
He wanted to fix the vacant-hearted putti, playful, in his stark American mind.
He'd tried to leave that faulty land unlined—just there, unformed, already vigorous, we ticked codes in secret through our parents' cells, already interrupted, muttering low.
Dawn's explosive moment. We can't quite conceive; what was he doing? What in hell, in the fallen world, was he out to show—leaning, breathing the old, Italian light?

First, let's look at the putti.
Pink, their chubby folds plump out the canvasses glassed over and retouched to ornament our museums—the lavish moment of art framed in humorous infants looking on from the edge.

No other hiding place.
Where does collapse begin?
(Here, I'll help a little:
there's no barbarian tribe coming for our young city.
The light of civilization breaks on the horizon nearer than we think.
It keeps gilding the windows.
How distant are the borders?)
This is what I mean

(darling, in the end I'll tell it all): remember, as we traveled through the desert toward the city, we saw its lights edging the far horizon a hundred miles away.
An unsafe highway: our headlamps snagged the dark-seeing eyes of small nocturnal mammals huddled in the brush, beating like hearts.
Their eyes caught red as coals, fired, then faded.
More dangerous than the dark, our rising light grows so vivid, so true, the animals run for it and everything illuminated blinds them.
This morning, through the kitchen windows, mountains burn with ice. We watch as long as we can then turn away. It is too bright to see.

What mortal loveliness.
The city rings with ice and I invent for us this extravagant desert undercut with faults that bump and grind beneath.
Do putti peer from under cacti frilled with blossoms?
Reader, art presumes, but not to that extreme.
A long time coming, life.
This is what I mean:

Let's examine the putti carefully, shall we?
What is it that the poets want from them?— perfect tourists, peering up the skirts of oil-daubed, dead madonnas. Did I say vacant-hearted? Vacant-headed, they hold the edge; the essential thing: they never say a word, and like most artful flirts, they don't put out.
The putti, not the poets or the madonnas.
Let's hold hands and stroll the galleries.
What stands of that constructed history?
How seriously we look on, poking our faces in past the frames, toward the canvasses, peripheral. And so we tour the world.
Stunning, it is beyond us. It has to do with all there is of beauty.

If we admit the putti— oh, forget it. Remember, the city glimmers on the lip of heaven, our own, parched, ringed with mountains.
All will seem breathtaking in retrospect, the earth itself atremble, our hands upheld against the impossible sun, our skin ablaze.

The gallery window reflects the city street.
Behind us, a girl raises her arms—against the stroke of love? The young man with his pants pressed firm against her hip where it plumps out into the bulge, tender, indiscreet, that swells the hem of her shorts? Here, amongst the window shoppers, remember the poet's angst, the vision where he wanted to repeat himself. Propped in the window, a Renaissance beauty overflows the freshly printed surface, her see-through nightie, into her own excess.
From each framed corner emerge the winged putti to chasten, to uncover the virginal breast her bridegroom eyes. He's still fully dressed.

Innocently, Dear Reader, as others have, we've met, stepped from our separate frames to one, touched each other's hands, then given in to the promising distance of courtship. Why not? If we've imagined the future poorly, we can't conceive Italy, its ornamental seductions, putti watching behind the weighty curtains.
Already fallen. A difference we believe.
The sun hefts its cold flame over the mountains, taking its tender time. And this ache that rises from our gestures as we watch the window in our reflected faces: the skin of ice goes to water, beads and breaks the brittle membrane; the glass holds it, etched, as we hold each other, having committed what the plot allowed, and having called it love. Dear, should we try to keep it?

Some things change the world too much to believe.

Can you believe the burning sky? At last it's inescapable. We step inside the museum foyer and the fault slides.
Resonant artifacts tremble and chime as we pass, and why not? Even the second best will move us to focus, the stolen and falsified.
From frame to frame, the putti catch our eyes and grow more lucid, their incidental gladness webbing out like ice to glaze the glass.
Titian, for example, showing off, brushed out this old imaginary painting (the putti finally central, explode the canvas) of Philastratus from mere words into life.
(Legs entwined with legs. The infants' panting kisses. Venus watches.)

The gaze we bring into this century: a room, a kitchen window we rise to look through in the morning—no apocalypse, just regular houses burning the same porch lights all day.

How long it takes to arrive, your hand pressing my back.
The putti watch us, gleeful, vacant, beyond us all.
Their foreheads press the membrane.
Mobile, dying, full,
the heart beneath my breast opens and closes hard.
What is the essential thing?
The future's brilliant surface glitters still (look hard now at my face): its violence drives us on.
