

THE WOMAN IN RED

by

Cynthia Hogue

Ahsahta Press
Boise State University
Boise, Idaho

Grateful acknowledgement is made to the following publications in which some of these poems have appeared (some in earlier versions or under different titles): American Poetry Review, Central Park, Fiction International, Greenfield Review, How(ever), Ironwood, Mazagine, Negative Capability, Raccoon, Sequoia, Women's Quarterly Review.

Previous collections:

Touchwood, Inland Boat Series 1 from Porch Publications, 1978 (chapbook)

Where the Parallels Cross from Whiteknights Press, 1983 (full length, limited edition)

My thanks go to former teachers Paul Reed, Stuart Friebert, John Logan, and Norman Dubie. I would also like to thank Jill Francis, Dean Stover, and especially Karen Brennan and Pamela Stewart for their help and encouragement.

Editor for Ahsahta Press: Orvis Burmaster

Copyright ©1989 by Cynthia Hogue

Second Printing, October 2000

Ahsahta Press books are printed on acid-free papers.

ISBN 0-916272-38-9

Library of Congress Catalog Card Number: 89-80856

for Hawk and in memory of Ian Fletcher

Now is life very solid or very shifting? . . . This has gone on for ever; will last for ever; goes down to the bottom of the world—this moment I stand on. Also it is transitory, flying, diaphanous . . . Perhaps it may be that though we change, one flying after another, so quick, so quick, yet we are somehow successive and continuous we human beings, and show the light through. But what is the light?

Virginia Woolf

Contents

Introduction by Pamela Stewart	iii
I
Burning Off The Past	1
Little Nothings	3
Rhapsody in Hand(s)	4
Small Change	6
It's No Dream	7
Landscape with Voice	9
In Denmark Fish Can Sing	10
Wolves and Tigers and Bears	12
II
The Seal Woman	15
Of Winter the Picture	16
Penelope's Tree	18
The Pool Shark, An American Fairy Tale	19
Swedenborg's Angels	21
Watching the Sea, A Dream	23
Witches	24
Ghost Town	26
Sorrow	28
Purgatory	30
III
The Woman in Red	35
You Wanted to Know	36
Walking the Wasteland in Thule	37
The Suicide Sonnet	39
Voodoo (economics)	40
Desert Palimpsest	43
Second Sight	48
Good Love's Echo	50
Meditation	51

NOTE: A centered asterisk indicates the poem has been broken mid-stanza.

Introduction

Reality may be finite, even recurrent despite its fresh and curious faces, but approaches to reality seem unlimited. I can think of no adjective-noun label to describe Cynthia Hogue's poetry. With its metaphysical suppleness and essential unity between motive and execution, this book illuminates the strategies of a particular mind as it seeks for accuracy, as it investigates the uses of language within the inclusive movements which structure a poem. The Woman in Red is a work of new, vivid combinations and passionate meditation. As there is no single emphasis—lyric, narrative, etc.—in the shaping of these poems, they continually surprise; “. . . but how we I you speak to each / other” is very much the matter of this book. Yet is Hogue questioning, making a statement, or throwing out a tonal aside? Read and see.

Virginia Woolf's words which declare this book open should be taken as a clue for reading what follows. They heighten what underlies the inquiries and observations within the poems. Hogue's diction is mercurial, playful in its urgency. Even as it stumbles and twists, we are carried into a precision of perception or thought, only to be sent free-floating again as her words stretch towards truth and true feeling. The strain is part of our reading. I'm baffled and instructed by how these poems can be so wrenching and still retain their sinewy grace. Within the complexities of her writing, Hogue's voice may also be down to earth and, to me from my distances, especially American in tone as well as image:

As the war revved up they built hundreds
of little brick houses
for the munitions plant workers—most of them women
left alone with their kids.
Man, those sticks and stone yards looked like hell until the war ended and there was no place but home for the women again.
“Desert Palimpsest”

Balance the plain speaking of those lines with the first stanza of “The Suicide Sonnet” where helplessness and disorientation press up against the rhyming form showing, perhaps, not only the personal difficulties of acceptance, but the awkward incongruity of this form itself for working through contemporary expression:

To be sad today and not to be able to said at all. This disjuncture of voice and memory, the something pure like love past heat past letting know.

Hogue's quest through language itself is less theoretical than personal and courageous. The poems become transparent with pain, puzzlement, and celebration to reveal the particularities of her mind and heart. To quote parts of these poems is unfair, for it's the startling wholes they make which move and inform me.

To say The Woman in Red is unique is flabby understatement. There are variations of voice and poetic shaping, even within a single poem. Often the pronouns shift, yet Hogue's vibrant intelligence has me both thinking and feeling in fresh, transformative ways. The focus is on "she"—the I as she, the you as she, as well as third-person shes—and while there are male presences, it's the women spoken of, and to, who stay in charge. These women may be figures of magic and power who are also flawed and vulnerable. Some slip out of myth only to dash around unfamiliar corners; some are friends, or a neighborhood of women on a streetcar. Others populate the poet's family—sisters, mother, and especially grandmother. But there are no cozy earth-mothers, simplistic in their decorative aprons. These women are not images; they are human, recognizable but not clichéd. This is not "women's poetry" in any publisher's-blurb sense. The Woman in Red holds moments of fear, of difficult suffering gilded by toughness. Here there are poems of abiding affection and resilience. Hogue's people are simply valuable. Her men are emblematic and more elusive: a somewhat faded father, a man of the present who suggests possible balances, the assailant, and dipping in and out of the book like an angel in traffic is the "lover" from her past—a figure of unresolved conversations, unfinished business. This "lost lover, old life" demands acknowledgment, but in the long run he can't interfere with the poet's present passions and abilities. By blood and friendship, the women in these poems bond as voyagers and what they share seems timeless even if enclosed by narrative. Some of Hogue's poems are rooted in childhood and the atmosphere of a family gone askew but still holding tight to its loyalties. Some of these poems blaze with the fantastic, but never the unbelievable.

Hogue's landscapes are chill and flushed. The physical world and the mystical world reveal themselves in Denmark, upper New York State, Iceland, and Arizona. From the desert's interior to lava fields to whatever moves beneath the sea, these poems fall into, and through, our world. As their reality strengthens, the seams split and mesh; the merchants of Tucson's Miracle Mile and the women groaning in the No-Tell Motel have equivalent importance to the ritualized mysteries of the solstice. For most of us, without words there is no way of living through this life, this world. The Woman in Red offers us assured and brilliant poems to sustain us. This book makes a big dent and no few scratches in the too-smooth familiar surfaces of current American poetry. These poems startle me; they enhance and excite my life. They force me to focus when I'd rather hide, but they also soothe and comfort me—even as the questions shift and whirl, and because they do.

Pamela Stewart
St. Ives, Cornwall
September, 1989

Burning Off The Past

isn't easy. And I wanted it to be. I've given a number of good years to prove it, but let's just say I'm still hot. Perhaps you already know the pattern: boy meets but she's really etc.
Frankly, I'm worried we're too dumb—not to talk, I don't mean that—and of course the philosophers who theorize how women don't exist have a point. We're the first to admit that as science takes out parts of our bodies, corruptible one by one, we have our doubts about staying embodied.
My sister, for example, uterine cavity now immaculate—But I'll always be blessed, she jokes. The scars make a cross—still needs to keep her spirit like her house.
No, I mean the ineffable matters of here, the hear me, hear me of the guy at the store who in reality asks only for spare change, the touch me, touch me of the stray who followed us one night loving along the river bank.
It was love but couldn't we have saved ourselves along with him?
The man and the woman at dawn.
The woman like the man like the woman who laughed herself out of it, the it being body. Being being.
I mean, how far do we have to go? Long ago, a woman, now dead, told me her lover said, Babywedontmakelovewemakeasymphony and if I believe the current

*

currents that harmony still vibrates somewhere and everywhere I laugh converges eventually with this place far away which, if I extend my arms to horizon and gather paradise, is palpable and near.

Little Nothings

Soft-tasting nibble vowels seek a genuine language but recover just “the will and the power to say everything.” “As long as we demand honesty”: but how we I you speak to each other. Has been a long time.
We’ve forgotten little things that nevertheless, thoughtless, pop up: Read me a story, the one where the prince saves the princess but my niece loses interest and suddenly her finger before my nose.
Which knows the scent, familiar, uncanny, and to pull back then to place it, think this should be your uncle, sweet, or at least your father, no? Still she wants me to smell—what did she call it?—not her wee-wee, the terribly wee girl-bud (the wee we adults don’t talk about with her) and her now self-conscious aunt wonders what I can say how I might?
Smell my _____, she demands.
But I have already and desire the child to wash her hands and return to Why/Because/Oh. What’s normal.
But disrupts the mother in the unmotherme. The unlover. We, you and I, whoever you are, once sat sipping like this a good beer. A good coffee.
The unspeaking scent.
The sense that nothing can say.

Rhapsody in Hand(s)

You held hands and I was there.
I was there, but my hands were in my lap.
You held hands in your mind.
You thought you held hands.
(Imagine holding the hands of the Chilean minstrel.
They were thrown away. You could not hold them.
What gets put back in its place.) My place was not in your hands but I was there.

When we ate the apples on the fruit plate.
And if we got some money, you said.
But travelling light is not limiting and one can, for example, buy oranges and cashews from Mozambique where the starving importunates travel but some people here sell their produce in order to get money there in the people's hands.

She said my mother holds the hand that can't move cupped to the sky. I said my mother wrings hers. After visiting my mother, you wrung your hands for a week. You're becoming my mother, I said. I'm becoming my mother, she said. She waved her hand before her face, which was a habit and didn't dispel. She quoted her.

"We think back through our mothers." A tall gaunt woman whose mother "died of overwork easily at forty-nine." But there was habit a leftover relic! Left behind, she would stand at the door waving until her brother rounded the corner.
"—a flutter of the dead hand which lay beneath the surface of family life."

“All I do is work work work,” my niece said, repeating her grandmother.
I am not afraid to go home.
My hands cup coffee mugs. Wash dishes.
Wring themselves. We think through our mothers.
“I am afraid to go home.” In the pictures, Marianella’s hands are covered with small burns from the cigarettes of the secret police.

I am my mother why won’t my hand move?
I said I’d be right back, but I was still there.

for Karen

Small Change

In the last year I could fit under your chin (if I hunched up and you stretched your head back) I rode your shoulders like a still small girl, insisting you play, though time you spent home shrank after you opened the place we called "the restaurant" until a friend said years later, Why your father's restaurant is really a diner. "A diner," I repeated, where all those nights you counted the day's take, setting aside the silver coins and certificates you'd keep in a cedar chest, laying away your hopes to make it big.

Only your daughter was big, growing like some out-of-control rubber plant, some great western tree in upstate NY—redwood, sycamore—and by the time I was seventeen a wild hothouse magnolia.

That year mother became unhappy, your other daughters grew ungainly too, and there was less and less reason for you to come home, I got my driver's license and my fake i.d., got into your silver which to me was just the spare change you never had on you.

I'd drive past the diner after the bars closed, see you ensconced in neon and venetian blinds, and because you couldn't see out, you felt no one could look in, or wistfully watch you tallying in your separate world the coins you'd then hide like so many perfect beloved children who grew slowly, gracefully fitting into even rows, and with whom you always could play.

It's No Dream

At five I played Maid Marian, and Robin Hood, dashing to save me, nailed me instead of the Sheriff with a shovel. It split my lip.

"X marks the spot," my sister teased until I shot up, Jack's beanstalk, out of the scar.
Though I never grew out of the will to be saved.

When I got in the stranger's car, at twenty, lost at dusk downtown in Buffalo, I knew only that I dared to. After all, he had the address, said he was selling weed to friends, and yes, what a coincidence!

But after I realized I was in for it, scared dumb still mind ran along—see there's time play calm until . . . I made myself talk, and talk and talk as he swung the car in wide arcs away from where I was going.

Finally in an alley, we fought, my voice cut off when I heard him call—It's ok she's my girlfriend. Then falling down under him as the door slammed and bolt locked on the house of those who'd come to see what the racket was. In the end, I was too big to beat. And was free and found a phone. But police had their version of my flimsy descriptions of man and car, of the poor reasons why I was there—the angry squeeze getting back—for once the blood was washed off, the eye patched, the finger sewn up, I wasn't badly hurt.

Though now an X marks me. The last time I was attacked, walking home after a late night shift of bad tips, I heard the car follow me onto the dark street where I lived. Three doors from home but my body stayed running in place. I cried, "You're tearing my coat," and when he said,

"Well nothing else will tear if you come with me," I was finally so tired I laughed.
Enraged, powerless, he pushed me in a snowbank.

"Happy now?" I said. What could he do but go? I sat all night with all the lights on writing father, who received in the envelope a piece of blank paper. "What's this, honey?" he asked. "What did you mean?" Only later

I knew, for in dreams, feelings of an old lover came back. He'd say,

"It's all right because I am here now." I'd wake up and, in the place and the moment where I was, feel safe enough to invoke myself, It's not him and it's no dream.

Landscape with Voice

Lilacs scented the air, delicate and aromatic as the Rose of Sharon grandfather gave mother before he died. On the long light evenings of midsummer mother would look at the tall rose tree blooming and recount the saga of how she forgot the plant in Detroit while visiting a friend who potted it and how a year later she came back never expecting but there it was, a flourishing Rose of Sharon which she then couldn't get through Canadian Customs but somehow she talked them into letting her—just a few hours' drive across, you know, and now look at that plant who'd ever have thought it would take over a year to bring it home when grandpa said, Now I want you to have that, dear. But it was meant to come, how it had thrived and how the rest of us would edge off to play badminton and our fat white kitten Sam leaped high as the net after the shuttle until the sun sank and all you'd perceive was the dim rising and falling of two white projectiles and one voice.

In Denmark Fish Can Sing

Old Ladies meet in Denmark at konditoris for coffee and cake.
I'd ride buses afternoons with the old ladies of Copenhagen who, after coffee, would go home to their overstuffed furniture, turn-of-the-century bric-a-brac and long Havana cigars. Like these women I donned black lambs' wool which I thought so cool in the States but no one under 80 wore in Denmark.
That Christmas when my grandmother opened her box of Havana cigars she thanked me well for she'd heard they were costly and could no longer be bought in America.

Today I watch an old lady with her too-bright rouge, her artfully dyed hair, her immaculate outfitting of body and soul, sip coffee and nibble a chocolate cupcake in the cafe in Tucson where you and I discuss Stonehenge and the recent Yoga Journal devoted to women. The old lady purses her lips and rounds her eyes as she looks the place over like an ancient 5 year old—not self-conscious, not reading to cover her aloneness.

I'm struck by her because this morning at the grocery I'd followed out of curiosity two aged women who had paid for a few modest meals with food stamps, which have lately been so rare.
One woman was frailer, smaller, murmuring as the other—still quite strong—pushed the cart, carried the bag.
They got into a shiny '55 Ford. Their dresses, looking the same vintage, were ironed, maybe even starched. When they drove off they broke into song.

So now when you tell me the catfish and trout you caught last week talked as they died, the catfish chattering at you, I remember how folk always said the fish in Denmark sing, how that is the real source of Hans Christian Andersen's famous tale, "The Little Mermaid." My grandmother, on the other hand, never smoked her Havana cigars though she stored them in her freezer along with her 80th birthday cake for two years.
Nevertheless, she sang beautifully until a very old age after which she sang anyway.

Wolves and Tigers and Bears

Replaced, body supplanted by words larger and larger the words grew but when body still connected spirit with sense we wolf cubs ran to the grandfather oak tree (the seer said Big Oak follows you, I can see him just behind) hole (whole) where his heart would be if he lived but he lives there are leaves—golden and rust—leaving him in fall.
And I'd watch him as I played bear, wolf, now I'm a mountain lion creeping one paw then the other along forest floor. Moss, cool dirt, pads in snow, deer flies in June but we wolves found our voices and lost the capacity to crouch.

What's this?

Who's there?

That day the band teacher spotted us in the school auditorium during "independent study" howling on our hands and knees down the aisles (my friend had short hair, he thought her a boy and us fooling around but we were) two girls pretending to be wild animals so we talked our way out of trouble and back to the world our fathers made us stay in . . . Until the last day senior year we rode off on her Harley at the end of the sixties after which acid eventually came to us as rain and free love as enterprise and words (man, cool) words words sufficed if only always imagined in the place of the loony moon wolves howled to, the way its light in woods changed us.

The Seal Woman

There was a moment when I thought I would go too.
I'd lived so long with my sisters crooning to men on shore, sometimes nuzzling those few found afloat in our sea back to motionless land.

At sunset, people would gather to watch us lifting ourselves up on rocks, our coats shivered with fire.
Then we'd dip back in, draw as near as we dared, and bob in the shallows watching them too.

But this night I am alone.
I have seen how the strange calls of men put limbs like their own on my sisters, stripped their fur to freezing white skin.
I've seen my two sisters crawl out of the water and look back at me with alien faces.

I tried to follow but they said, in voices already altered, *They gave you no name;
you must stay there.*
I waited to be named a long time.
Now I wait for my sisters.

Their hair is white as their wrinkled hide.
They come down to the water to keen for their lost skin and for the one whose name escapes them. But I've caught their gaze and—dry so long—their eyes fill with the sea.

Of Winter the Picture

Sky stretches through maple and above the blue frozen lake and black mound of hills the sun flares fuchsia in the photo you took the day you left: the kind of montage only the very distraught come upon and are surprised because they've stared blindly at the ground so long some reflex urges them to look up.

 Lost lover, old life, to you I scratch notes that scatter in a space where feelings still mark me like a trail we tracked together in woods. You taught me to read the prints inscribed on snow each morning and which animals had made them hunting at night—the lynx and wolf, the owl who leaves no trail but the tiny impress of a mouse-body swept into air by its scruff.

 Some neighbors always cursed dogs they said ran deer down and one of them finally took a gun to the pack, felled our collie bitch.
By dusk I'd found the traces of blood on snow, had reached nothing that could, through the vanishing light, be brought home.

 I never told you how terrifying and sadly twilight came that day, how when I turned to backtrack wind rushed high up in trees that creaked and leaned like old houses, how snow unfurled off branches, filling my tracks, and banks grew blue-shadowed as I hunched over skis,

*

and finally the ice-stubbed lake I rushed across to beat sunset was so vast the golds and reds dissolved into night before I reached the other side.

Years later I come upon your picture tossed in a bureau drawer.
I trace the trees—their winter branches fretting a skein of clouds around the sun—and still the heart of whatever between us that lies always undone.

Penelope's Tree

When I returned you sat in a crook of limbs chipping bark off the tree that should have cradled our marriage bed.
You swung on branches you said you'd weave for us into a swinging hammock but your arms are empty and there's nothing your hands made while I was gone.

I still say you sent me to the ends of the earth in search of beauty and didn't I come back luminous with knowledge?
I was your voyager, after all.
And though you claim I've turned the story around, I'm really trying to tell your version, which I can't seem to remember.

In mine you've grown wooden—a stiff little fetish—in a place desire no longer enchants. The tree's arms are dying, it is impossible to embrace anymore and either I'm off or we must make do like talking spirits who recognize the foreigner in each other.

The Pool Shark, An American Fairytale

What she really wanted was for her nails to curve like waxing crescent moons on the amber side of flesh tone.
But she sat filing them into points again which she'd paint blood-red this Friday so they'd be shiny, unchipped, and startling as she spread her long fingers out on the green felt of the pool table in Dizzy's Not Ready For Prime Time Bar & Grill just as the place was beginning to cook.

Her nails clicked against the cue stick while she waited between shots but her aim on a good night sank one ball after another home. The boys were charmed when she flubbed the break.
Then she'd blow them off the table with a straight run when she got in.
She'd been taught the angles by a WWII vet who met her shot for shot of bourbon in Buffalo, and years later, she learned her banks and top spins from a Viet vet in Phoenix who was crazy to get into her pants, so she let him teach her the gamut until she'd polished her plays to precision, then told him she never mixed sex with the game—on principle, he should understand.

But the ice light blue of his eyes froze hard and she knew where he'd learned the ropes,

*

knew he saw her nails now and flashed Saigon razor vagina, jungle fireworks, and the homeland's welcome home boys royal screw over. She knew one night as she'd be lining up the eight he'd whisper—That's the last sucker that cue ball bitch gonna sink.
She'd turn around and before everything would go stars her nails would shine a wetter hotter red as they scraped red stripes down the flag of his white-hot face.

Swedenborg's Angels

As a boy Swedenborg prayed for God to give him a vision.
That night he saw fourteen angels round his bed, each protecting a part of him.
But they began to quibble.
The two at his feet wished to be at his head. The two on his left side wanted his right. And so on.
It became an ongoing battle. Swedenborg didn't sleep for months.
He suffered retardation of growth, and stayed the height of a twelve-year-old.
But he never lost the gift of seeing angels squabbling.
He founded a sect on it.

That night his sister who also went to sleep with a prayer discovered she could leave her body through the top of its head and fly around all night.
She spent her months learning to leap off cliffs and swing up on air currents gliding over the village for all to see (though none saw).
She practiced great swoops and continued to grow because, it seemed,
her body rested while her soul flew.

When she told her father, he tried to beat such devil's talk out of her.
But with herself she kept a pact to fly forever.
Sometime later she was spotted, her sleeping body seized and burned as a witch.
So she retreated into the ozone where she encountered Swedenborg's angels waiting for him to doze off.
She became one of them and disrupted her brother's sleep for life.
What choice, after all, had she left?

for Gillian

Watching the Sea, a Dream

A child wails—and in fingers of raining clouds across the bay the airforce base disappears: Thunder claps. A slat of light widens on the sea until we know the door's ajar for a time. First the birds hover to look in and down the portal. They swoop, dive, as boats scuttle to the threshold through which the fishermen—singly and in pairs—begin to plunge.
We gather at windows and onshore. Some are starting to swim, the current tugging them out further, the door widening to meet them.
Then the beacon flashes across and the surrounding grayness engulfs all the light from sea: The door surges back to a sliver as if some underwater shock were heaving it shut; we know then it is well to move away from the scene, pretend we saw nothing and knew none who vanished.
We cradle our children who stare off at the wrong place as if at a disfiguring scar.

Witches

The game started when as girls we snuck into our neighbor's garden and played in their trees until the two sisters we called witches came out to shoo us home and we ran through the gloom of fall.

Some of us would fall and the older tended the younger girls once we reached our hideout at home.
We pressed a garden of knobs and buttons until the witches left and again we climbed in their trees.

Then laden, the trees cried with our cries as we'd fall down into rhubarb we called Witches' Sour that we crushed into the little girls' hands to make them squeal. The garden clung; we still winced at home.

And back of their home like bony crooked trees snapping and swaying in an overrun garden as if ready to fall, the furious sisters rake girls up like leaves in a heap which is eternally piled for a witches' bonfire. "My father built our home before we were born and when girls he bought us [white, fake, tiny] this tree," said the older sister one Christmas. "Here's fall's only harvest—rhubarb jam from the garden."

(It's guts from a body in the garden because, I thought, they really are witches.
Invited alone I wondered, How did I fall for the Cookies And Jam Come Into My Home trick?) They had figures like trees.
Had they been touched since girls?

No fruit grows in the garden now or in the trees where the witches first learned to fall, but the unconsummated home remains they left as girls.

Ghost Town

When she lived in a country whose livelihood was fishing, she stayed once in a village at the end of a fjord. Mountains rose to block the sun. There was only one hotel, near the ghost part of a boomtown—wharves, dwellings, hostels for fishermen who had followed the herring away years ago. Her room was over the main street.
Nothing was open but an ice cream kiosk.
A man named Glacier was telling about his afternoon, casting lines, snatches of tales over the radio waves like northern lights spanning a winter's dark sky, though it was recorded, the cashier said, he'd been dead a long time.
He wrote plays, she added, he walked into the sea.
He spoke an older, finer dialect the woman only half understood no matter how hard she listened.

That night she dreamed of grandmother who insisted on telling her the future—of good, then bad.
She cried no more, please, no more and Amma said then I won't be coming again.
Who'd want to know the future?
Yet in the end she was dead curious for as her grandmother left a waterwheel turned (she could still hear its revolutions—the creaks in ancient wood, the green tang of water as it spilled through all seeming so real) and she suddenly feared

*

that between wakings all she loved might vanish, everything for good.
Later, in the hotel café under neon, she drank whiskey, biding the night like faith as if it were not there.

Sorrow

The women know about it. In my family the grandmother having lived it all past seems serene and is senile and the laughing daughters when young mothers sitting in the yard at reunions after the dinner dishes were put away and the kids in bed, the husbands milling around while the sisters drank and discussed whom father loved best. We would sneak down to hatch our next play and watch fireflies zing beyond the front porch the laughing then the crying floating—What are they doing?— from the back yard until our mothers would hear us, come with their mosquito lamps and scurry us back to bed. But we'd sit up whispering until the pieces of their voices faded into the fan's whir—they who so beautiful while we'd fall into sleep grew with the years so sad.

And it's your guess as good a time as could be had when we all last got a real spree, it was, together they taught us to minimize that old stuff, ourselves—taught us to be nice but we were all so strapping wild—valkyries they called us once in Germany where they romanticize size and blondes' eyes.
(In myth choose-corpse, choosers of the slain in battle, can you beat that? my sister said when I told her.)

The men wander
With their Manhattans and their beers, talking of what to do. Uncle declaring he has found love at sixty leaves. Grandfather confides in father—House full of women, never said a thing at home they thought was right and father to son-in-law: am always wrong here wrong here I am where I'll stay.

The cousins women now though some of us—still play—Our primadonna the banker, for instance, orders two full meals at her favorite Italian restaurant, drinks a bottle of red wash it all down so she can talk again: Her mink hangs in Houston because her husband in New York doesn't know she left him for three months for another man or she would show it to us. I like a look of agony because I know it's true for she fooled me, pal together into the city at fifteen to have adventures couldn't see through her. Bravo, cossima.
And so we all try to rise back to the place where we knew was wholeness, was light at the age before sorrow carried our mothers and fathers out of our world.

for Doie, 1928–1987

Purgatory

And for the rest of the world we practiced making good rings, pictures, phrases, caresses—anything we felt could be perfected, completed before time frayed.
But some things could not be improved.
How, for instance, could one perfect “I love you” except perhaps to learn to say it in every language especially the very obscure whose speakers were already near extinction?

Or perfect coupling except perhaps perfectly to love everyone we’d ever loved or everyone, or to love completely, assuming it were the same as to couple.

That’s when we saw we could never perfectly understand and that practice did not without question lead to perfect.

I stood under rain, the cool wash refreshed. I took my lover’s hands and raised them against the light. I could see through them.
Anything that comes, he said.
Now we shall watch.

* * *

Not that I can see who's watching, but when I walk into stands of aspen and white spruce to be alone I never am (or remember why we came, how we got here).

At night, a voice drones at us disturbing our sleep, already restless in our long rows of dorm beds like graves.

But no one's sick,
I was told, only making amends.
I'm not on the inside of this place; it has crept inside us who have forgotten to ask for answers, like little bells of forgiveness.

Yet a woman and I grasp hands—it is something.

Now we have only the memory of hands.
The air grows so close sometimes my breath spirals up.
I'd laugh more often at that oddness, how our forms become shimmery and see-through as tropical fish but we know this is serious.
Then hold your breath, I think.
And all of us think that later comes the music and the play.

The Woman In Red

You might settle here where if you did settle a red vase could be in your window (but unwashed and without flowers because a hole in the vase from an earlier crack-up you might have inherited. The vase from a potter who went to Paris where she roams the Rue St.
Hélène on Sundays and pauses with her new lover for coffee and toasted ham sandwiches they eat while even the cathedral “looks damp and miserable today in the drizzle in the spring rain.”) Where you did settle the magnetic ions from cars shift and dance and rise to make the orange-gold haze they say is dangerous was beautiful at sunset once driving out of a city you watched the full moon beam at the sun going down (It was another place you definitely never thought of settling in) is beautiful and risky as the women on billboards who smoke, who appear to smoke and who laugh through the smokescreen who have no laugh lines who cannot understand humor but who smile forever, who may be real, somewhere beyond the camera but who never leave the picture.
You would like to be dangerous like them. You are a dangerous woman but do they tap your phone, speak softly in monotones like robots about what you do? They could say Her house is unkempt, she spends her time dreaming of danger and peace. She is consummately inconsequential.
Her life is a fishnet. She writes letters. She never bounces back or takes lovers on rebound, on principle. She’s decomposing.
She is unsettling before their eyes and says when they think she’s dreaming, “natheless, syn I knowe youre delit, chese now” and they choose “the terribly important small things” that bespeak a look they for no reason feel desperation, betrayal, but is yet gorgeous and yes—nothing depends on the red vase, the white mums she didn’t arrange, the curtains she never hung, the bird of red wings tweeting loudly in the tree of your yard’s scruffy spring.

You Wanted to Know

Something about her. You with your Vuarnets, your Gargoyles convexly scooped over crowsfeet that enrich your past.
You could be on a white stretch of fabulous Greek beach or the black lava wasteland that is, in Iceland, called a beach.

Because you're watching, we do not ourselves get to know about her—what she looks like or what she thinks because you picture yourself beside her, you see how you look to others beside her.
You wanted, dear, to be very cool.
Indeed, you're impeccable. But in this world there are people who say they love you though you don't have to believe them for all that, what did your father call it, malarky?

Mine would say weissenheimer, You Weissenheimer, right out of The Honeymooners, only he'd only say it when he hadn't really listened and saying dispelled daydreaming.
We loved it for it meant he was for a moment listening but we hated it for my father would then poke us in the ribs and we'd say, Oh Daddy, and stub his foot and there we'd be, my father like Reagan silent after his one joke.

Well I've left you, surfing amongst the dolphins, who I dream are in danger to awake and find they really are.
But you're cool while in your surf the dolphins are leaping and beeping, for now safe from nets and nuclear waste though I'm sad and someday, I promise, I'll tell you more about her.

Walking the Wasteland in Thule

Rusty with lichen, tufted with grass, lava dolmens rise across the lake where the tiny Odin's hen and eider ducks raise their young in summer.
There's a stiff wind today, bringing the scent of sulphur through the fragrance of angelica, birch, and wild iris that gives way as we come in sight of the volcano we climbed two years ago a week before it erupted.

The slopes had turned amber, bright ochre, orange and lavender. Everywhere was steaming, billowing sulphur gas through crack and fissure.
The earth rumbled and pulsed with lava bulging beneath surface.
We got lost in the mist, went further and further into the territory we feared. When the mountain erupted, ochre turned to gold, orange to molten red, lavender to black shooting ash.
And incarnadined through smoke, the full moon watched with you.

For it is not my memory but revering yours, almost a dream that leads us back to the place of devastation, land that is again hot to the touch.
You say that somewhere up ahead is a valley where no birds nest the lake, no ancient basalt pierces the horizon, but new pumice crumbles into sand and only lambs' cress is sturdy enough to sink roots.
We pass the warning sign.
This raw past we're walking toward is like our own—molten flows that effaced the known contours to make another tenuous geography.

The wind pushes at us. Go back.
But we go on, losing each other in the mist all over again. What we came to do is walk the ineffable desert, a beginning engraving its aftermath on our hearts, inscribing a path though blown away the moment we step out of it.

The Suicide Sonnet

To be sad today and not to be able to
said at all. This disjuncture
of voice and memory, the something pure
like love past heat past letting know.

What was not done undoes when lovers face each other's loss. But yelled at me you never, no nothing you said you see I am. I'd have liked to erase the figure of the woman, with you to say like Nietzsche that she was truth was lies and circumstance and always as I was not. I couldn't one way or another imagine/you. What was your harbor. Haven. Where you flowered for.

for Knud-Erik Holme Pedersen, 1953–1982

Voodoo (economics)

When there's time, you said, but you said there's not time (and weren't you even slightly

? The girl turned to her friends. [ready?] It's a fifties sort of place, she said, really weird.

But they have great cakes).

Rolled up into nude like a ball another girl. A glass table balanced on her.

She told how she didn't feel demeaned.
She was paid a lot for the picture they took.

"The fact of the matter" was repeated by all the men on the show. But they meant different facts—or matters. The topic was nothing as abstract as truth or bestiality (though one of them, maybe two, in another life, had slept with the questionable).

So I was still trying to get at the heart of their matters. These earthly dissemblances. People whom, a movie star intones, have chosen their fates an example of which is at the bottom of a rubble-filled canyon: two stray skulls, signs of an earlier violence only partially exposed. The news reports that daisies don't bloom in the eye sockets but that socks are a problem in the shelters of the homeless. There are (gimme gimme gimme gimme shelter) none. That people are not warm they do not come out as they were but that they are not dead but “Changed beyond all recognition” (over & beyond that there’s no family left to recognize them).

To get at the heart might matter if. But patience, Augustine, is not its own reward. For instance.

I have waited allmylife for father to buy a coffee mug with my name on it.

There were yellow roses above my name—grandmother’s favorite flower who died recognizing no one, remembering she’d had the grocery money ready for grandfather when one day he pulled all the tubes and spit at his weeping son, Leave me go.

Never shopped again, grandpa. On her car it read

Born To Shop. And, Shop Until You Drop. Bag it, Bag man. With pants dropping he sat in the far end of the subway car and pulled his head inside his coat—and yes it was a bit like a turtle—to sleep. (And what matter that we sleep askew if fate is just another four-letter word.) All the small kindnesses. She said she was well paid. And a hoary though familiar face in the night’s fluorescenced window, in the mirror in the rest home the night nurse came upon her staring at: the old woman turned then still surprised to have seen an old woman.

But I’m still me, she said.

Never mind the night nurse, who had just divorced, crooned to herself, you're still You

*remind me of a man. What man?
The man with the power. What power?*

*The power of voodoo. Who do?
You do. Do what?*

*Remind me of a man. What man?
The man with the power. What power?*

*The power of voodoo. Who do?
You do. Do what? Remind me—*

Give up? "Have you ever seen anything like this in your entire life?" the ad campaign read.

"Buy this"

Desert Palimpsest

Century plants guard the windows.
Light arrows through the shades.

From anywhere in town you could still see straight up to the Catalinas in those days.

When I was a girl they said I had the sight.
Old Father sweated
it out of me.
He told mother afterwards
"Do not worry, she will not disgrace the family now."

I have pictures on my wall.
I have a husband.

On the Miracle Mile Strip the city cleaned up the ghosts of chicanas in mascara and honky women in skintight miniskirts walk up and down all night.

"Behind the garden, behind the wall, under the tree. . ."
Fool! There are no trees here.

Though the No-Tell Motel still takes the girls who turn tricks. . .
I guess you can't clean it all up.

Later a spell was placed on my family.
We didn't know why our work was no good.

“There are no accidents, only coincidence.”
Closure. Summer heat awash over me.

“Well there’s a tall drink of water.”
“Long tall Sally.”
“Hey, Joe, that’s not my name.”
“Not mine either.”

How can we be present when even sound in the air above us distracts?
Control.
Concentrate.

Old Father had a vision: Coyote has been mischievous.
We gathered for the ritual purification.

As the war revved up
they built hundreds
of little brick houses
for the munitions’ plant workers—
most of them women
left alone with their kids.
Man, those sticks and stone yards
looked like hell until the war ended
and there was no place but home
for the women again.

We walked into the hills on the night of the longest day.
One by one we sat on the stone marked with the circle inside the circle.

But I play at thought.
At home. Home is where—The heart exacts—Extract yourself.
Ecstasy (from

The last desperado was shot in the back over a card game in 1911; the last grizzly in 1912 over its yearly spring lamb.
He was very old and wily at eluding the law but they finally got him.

outside.
What is outside?
“It is like a new knowledge” of grace.
The pursuit of happiness distracts.)
I recall when life with my lover was magic.
Talk, talk,
he says now.

When my turn came to sit, the sun between the angle two peaks make rose.
I was a woman but the spirits had chosen me to see.
This time we accepted their gift.

The merchants on Miracle Mile want to change the name to Oracle.
Oracle what? Street?
Avenue?
Way?

Ecstasy, yourself:
What you call you is a long way from your body which you can observe as down a long hall and you think I'm dying but that no longer scares you.
No. Here's another try:
You are beside your/self, by yourself (or "I am all alone here.") Hex: "Infinite capacity for woe."

Bliss: "The fuchsia is a bliss of sorrow."

Dichotomy: "it cannot exist in language;
or perhaps:
in language alone:"

I called Stop, stop, but it wasn't until later he defined reality as dichotomous, and much later that I dreamed a little girl I didn't know was having her fortune told.

Miracle Mile: the road where forever a woman fakes a moan in bed.
Lover, she cries...

Now our baskets are round again and our shadows walk in God's shadow.

I knelt down beside the fortune teller who said fortunes are inside knowledge—nothing/ no one outside.
(Love, she commenced.
Just love she said. “This world is not Conclusion.”) But I insisted on knowing if the girl’s future would be felicitous.
What do you mean felicitous? she asked.

Second Sight

Ice of an older year reaches the house before midnight like clouds over the lake and over the house.
They climb a worn spiral of a staircase the people who live in the house who are tired and too simple for their government.
Who haven't seen anything yet see the clouds drained from the lake's surface that lichen over before first frost.

The fish couldn't breathe but fish in this lake and anyway what do you eat? Drink from it and what do you imbibe?
When you offer no love your world grows lined and laments. But the couple in the house haven't seen anything to see yet are insurgents of sight offering myrtle-covered paths, a rose or lilac bush, a vine-covered arbor you walk through into a garden where at bottom fairies live as the woman still sings to her children.

They are tired, they haven't paid their taxes, they dance like old men who dance with bombs abroad.
(Instead they stop mid-sentence as if struck, and cold. They comport themselves with wisdom and little lies. This is your changeling, your happy governed folk, they sing. You're not cold, are you my dears? in this country, not for old men with the power and the glory but for deer approaching winter, crunching the tender icicles hanging from the eaves of this falling down house where they see where.)

*

Good Love's Echo

Empty now—the place of echoing hills where we slept under birch on the island and I dreamed of a spirit cathedral and saw its bishop. Now (the window left ajar, a thread of sudden gold as the curtain lifts, the figure of a green winged deer—the wood spirit-carving you brought back from Bali as a gift. I always wanted to conjure).
Airborne a falcon. Light strayed through bamboo flanning out, a web we were inside of. A cat appeared like a familiar weaving between us. The people you said on the island speak only of the present—spirits multiple in their households. We wanted to stay forever walking along the watermarks. You pressed your face to the cool flame in my palm.
The hour turned the night over.
For awhile we urged some sign. Anyway it's superstition you said, the intonations of our voices turning to the water's lap as if the moment gone, the isolate space of desire—like night—comes round again. If we could push back the seams of unseen edges. The wood carver you said thought flying deer live only in America where we have magic cowboy Reagans too and did not worry when you told him there are none for he knew that here we see no spirits. I stroke you distant as I am from your territory.
My deer rises like a constellation.
Inside, the stillness we do not know for sure and have no magic.

Meditation

We breathe in and are in and surrender suffuses resistance. Ourselves. Tallying the layers of false love that drop off.
Until we're left with. Something specific, memory of mirage.
For after all, we live in a desert whose central vortex is somewhere up north. People come here to. Come here, closer, where man honors woman, man man woman woman, but it doesn't begin to recover the possible inandof between. Yes, our love caretakes a huge desert garden.
Here man sees self and doesn't.
Where in the world he carries like the large-eyed llama. Where enlightenment: is homeless wandering struck by nothing we give. Everything. Is not not this?
Not this.
Where in the world we walk.

Cynthia Hogue was born in Rock Island, Illinois, and grew up in the Adirondack Mountains of upstate New York. As a child, she wrote poems, stories, and, with her cousins, plays that they put on for many years at family reunions during the summer. While completing her B.A. in Comparative Literature at Oberlin College (1973), she began writing poetry seriously. She earned an M.A. in Arts and Humanities at SUNY/Buffalo (1975), and received a Fulbright Fellowship to Iceland (1980), where she studied and translated Scandinavian poetry and met her husband.

A teacher of writing and literature since 1976, Hogue is currently completing her Ph.D. at the University of Arizona. She has also worked as a literacy tutor with emotionally disturbed adolescents, as a cross-cultural educator, and as a waitress. She lives in Tuscon.

Ahsahta Press

MODERN & CONTEMPORARY POETRY OF THE AMERICAN WEST

The Ahsahta Anthology (casebound and paperbound editions)

- Sandra Alcosser, A Fish To Feed All Hunger David Axelrod, Jerusalem of Grass *David Baker, Laws of the Land Dick Barnes, Few and Far Between *Conger Beasley, Jr., Over DeSoto's Bones
Linda Bierds, Flights of the Harvest Mare Richard Blessing, Winter Constellations *Peggy Pond Church, New & Selected Poems Katharine Coles, The One Right Touch Wyn Cooper, The Country of Here Below Craig Cotter, Chopstix Numbers
*Judson Crews, The Clock of Moss
H. L. Davis, Selected Poems
*Susan Strayer Deal, The Dark Is a Door
No Moving Parts
*Gretel Ehrlich, To Touch the Water Gary Esarey, How Crows Talk and Willows Walk Julie Fay, Portraits of Women
*Thomas Hornsby Ferril, Anvil of Roses Westering
*Hildegard Flanner, The Harkening Eye Charley John Greasybear, Songs Corrinne Hales, Underground
Hazel Hall, Selected Poems
Nan Hannon, Sky River Gwendolen Haste, Selected Poems
Kevin Hearle, Each Thing We Know Is Changed Because We Know It And Other Poems
Sonya Hess, Kingdom of Lost Waters Cynthia Hogue, The Woman in Red *Robert Krieger, Headlands, Rising Elio Emiliano Ligi, Disturbances

Haniel Long, My Seasons
*Norman Macleod, Selected Poems Ken McCullough, Sycamore•Oriole Barbara Meyn, The Abalone Heart
Dixie Partridge, Deer in the Haystacks Gerrye Payne, The Year-God
George Perreault, Curved Like An Eye
Howard W. Robertson, to the fierce guard in the Assyrian Saloon *Leo Romero, Agua Negra Going Home Away Indian Miriam Sagan, The Widow's Coat
Philip St. Clair, At the Tent of Heaven Little-Dog-Of-Iron Donald Schenker, Up Here
Gary Short, Theory of Twilight
D. J. Smith, Prayers for the Dead Ventriloquist *Richard Speakes, Hannah's Travel
Genevieve Taggard, To the Natural World *Marnie Walsh, A Taste of the Knife Bill Witherup, Men at Work
*Carolyn Wright, Stealing the Children Women Poets of the West: An Anthology, 1850-1950

*Selections from these volumes, read by their authors, are available on The Ahsakta Cassette Sampler.

<http://www.boisestate.edu/english/ahsahta>