Ah, Wilderness!, in addition to being a popular and satisfying comedy, portrays a personal myth involving deep concerns of its author. O'Neill avoids dealing with his actual childhood experiences, especially his often stormy relationship with his father, matinee idol James O'Neill. That troubling and destructive tale is searingly revealed in the nearly autobiographical drama, Long Day's Journey into Night. In Ah, Wilderness! O'Neill presents a desirable, almost sentimental, fantasy of a stable, supportive and loving family. Richard Miller is certainly O'Neill's version of himself as a boy maturing into manhood. Sadly, the model for father Nat Miller in the play was not James O'Neill, but the admired editor of the New London Telegraph, a paper that employed young Eugene as a reporter. Most of O'Neill's theatrical world presents a dark, brooding mood of what one critic described as "melodramadness." Yet, just once, he created a delightful stage piece peopled with characters who love, trust, reconcile and grow through mutual respect. He titled it Ah, Wilderness! after a line from The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam and described it as "A Comedy of Recollection."
