

4-24-2020

A Northwest American Sound in Classical Music

Allen W. Skirvin
Boise State University

Eric S. Alexander
Boise State University

Linda Kline
Boise State University

A Northwest American Sound in Classical Music

Allen Skirvin

Background

The music you'll hear in this presentation is inspired by my upbringing in the woods of the Pacific Northwest.

Techniques to Listen for

1. The music rarely has a sense of meter. Music of this type is called "ametric" and is meant to embody the spontaneity of nature.
2. The string part sounds very fiddly, with lots of double stops and slides.
3. Listen for the stark contrast in style between the piano and viola
4. There is a section halfway through the composition where the viola is loosely imitating country yodeling, can you hear it?
5. Does the music at times sound conversational to you?

But don't take my word for it! Here is link to the composition. Let me know what you think!
<https://youtu.be/Oqeyw2CwzrE>

“Composers are like the flora of cultures, creating landscapes suited for their climates.”

The Compositional Process of this Piece

- My music tends to be based in heavy improvisation with no preconceived direction.
- Rather than an organized outline of scales, chords, and rhythms, musical ideas passively drift into my conscious through stories of my past, and the pastoral imagery that complements it.
- I tend to think conversationally when writing music. I approach musical phrases with the mindset of, “how would I say this?” versus, “how would I play this?”

Contact

AllenSkirvin@u.boisestate.edu

Mentors

Dr. Eric Scott Alexander,
Dr. Linda Kline

“My music is imperfect, but embodies the northwest.”

BOISE STATE UNIVERSITY