

THE ABALONE HEART

by Barbara Meyn

Ahsahta Press
Boise State University
Boise, Idaho

Grateful acknowledgment is made to the following publications, in which some of these poems first appeared: A&E, Blue Unicorn, California State Poetry Quarterly, Everywhere, First Leaves, Green Fuse, Northglow, Poets of the Vineyard Anthology, Ridge Review.

Editor for Ahsahta Press: Tom Trusky

© 1988 by Barbara Meyn

ISBN 0-916272-37-0

Library of Congress Catalog Card Number: 88-071465

For Harry

Contents

Introduction by D. L. Emblen	iii
CROSSROADS
Crossroads	3
The Day the Drought Ended	4
February on the Mountain	5
The Change	6
A Stone for My Father	7
Again	8
In Sheep's Clothing	9
Beware Blackberries Bearing Gifts	10
Ghosts	11
Walking in October Woods	12
Dividing Line	13
Something like November	14
Over the Pass	15
MEDICINE BUNDLE
Medicine Bundle	19
Like Xeno's Turtle	21
Act of Faith	22
The Abalone Heart	23
Swimming Stony Creek	24
Ceremonial Basket	25
Place Names	26
Staying Warm	27
Whale Watch at Bodega Head	28
Hazel	29
Elegy for Young Firs	30
SLEEPING ON THE TERMINAL MORaine
The Salamander	33
Volume 99	34
Sawtooth	35
Changing	36
Petitioning	37
Putting the Garden to Bed	38
The Day the Clock Stopped	39
At the Planning Commission	40
Joy	41
The Careful Years	42

Ano Nuevo	43
Going Away: An Ode to the House	44
Lesson One	45
Sleeping on the Terminal Moraine	47
EXPLORING DEATH VALLEY
Moving	51
Dirge for Submersible Pump	52
Kneeling by a Raised Bed	53
Pinnacle Gulch, Minus Tide	54
Sailing around Angel Island	55
Exploring Death Valley	57

NOTE: A centered asterisk indicates the poem has been broken mid-stanza.

Barbara Meyn, an Introduction

William Stafford once turned the tables on a supercilious critic who tried to belittle him by calling him “regional.” “Being tagged a ‘regional artist’ didn’t hurt much,” Stafford wrote, for, after all, every artist must maintain “the knack for responding to the immediate, the region . . . that’s where art is. . . . That’s the ground for their art, the place where they live.”

An earlier poet held a similar idea. According to Henry David Thoreau, the poems arise from the very ground the poet stands on.

And now, with the publication of The Abalone Heart, still another American poet, Barbara Meyn, makes the point again. Her poems, some of which range as far as any of us could throw a question, do indeed rise from the very local ground she walks: the little path, say, wriggling from the broken-down wicker chair, her favorite observation post for keeping track of the life going on in the woods, back through a small plantation of seedlings in one-gallon cans and odd little stacks of short lengths of boards and two-by-fours that might come in handy some time, and up to the backdoor of the cluttered little house where she lives with her musician husband, Harry Meyn. The importance of the place where she walks is not in her footprints, which are very much like anyone else’s; it is in the genuineness of the work that comes out of the place, a genuineness which grows out of the care with which this poet takes in this place. It is the work of one whose quick eyes see what others ignore, and whose contemplative mind sees connections among those seen things and between them and the whole ranging universe of human endeavor.

I am talking here about a principle of composition, one so amazingly simple it is hard to understand why it is so hard to understand: it is the concrete—not the abstract—that convinces us we are dealing with something real; and it is discovered connections that make the real things significant.

How far back must we go to get a sense of the history of our trying to teach this to ourselves? In English poetry, every master poet, from Chaucer to the present, demonstrates this principle, so, to save time, let us settle for one authority, a Chinese poet and scholar of the Eleventh Century, one Wei T’Ai, translated by A. C. Graham:

Poetry presents the thing in order to convey the feeling. It should be precise about the thing and reticent about the feeling, for as soon as the mind responds and connects with the thing, the feeling shows in the words; this is how poetry enters deeply into use.

Barbara Meyn’s title poem, “The Abalone Heart,” is not the best poem in the volume, but, like all the others, it shows what a master this poet is of the principle mentioned above. Abalone shells, some of them as big as hubcaps,

This is the way poems often begin for her, Meyn says: first, an observation; second, reflections and a few scribbled lines. Then the work begins—revisions—up to thirty or forty of them according to her count (and mine). Mother-of-pearl is not made overnight either. It takes a lot of heart.

The Abalone Heart is Barbara Meyn's only book since her first volume, Blue Heron on Humbug Creek, in 1981.

These poems take Marianne Moore's famous demand for "a place for the genuine," a step further. Moore asked for "real toads in imaginary gardens"; Meyn provides real toads in real gardens—toads and gardens made both real and significant by her stubborn insistence on seeing what's there and her hard-won skill of using the precise, the concrete, and the local to illuminate and acknowledge the evanescent, the ineffable, the undefined.

D. L. Emblen
Santa Rosa, California
August, 1988

Part I Crossroads

Crossroads

(for Blanche Brown)

When heat shimmers across the fields she remembers climbing a fence to watch them walk by, overallled men looking straight ahead, long-skirted women, baskets on their backs laden with babies, blankets, acorn meal.
They came from Sanel and traveled to the coast to gather seaweed, abalones, clams.
Following roads that eclipsed their deep-worn paths, they camped along the way. Tonight they'd sleep at Grandfather's, lying down with delight in the green clover field by Big Spring, plucking and munching the tart stems and leaves.
The women would spread cloths under the oaks to catch acorns they knocked down with sticks.
Cloths full and tied, they'd rest on the porch while the men solemnly gathered, speaking low, waiting for Grandfather and his burlap bag to come from the garden. Their dark eyes would follow him as he rolled ripe melons out and cut them up. They'd smiled as the sweet juice dribbled down their chins. "Good, Bee-ll!" they'd say as they spat the seeds. Or merely "Bee-ll!" in a fond voice as they drifted off to camp.
He often said it was a poor trade, a few melons, a night in a clover field for the rich, free life that they had known.

Maybe they'd stay to work for a day or two.
More often they'd leave next day, expecting an abalone tide, going their way while he went his, cutting hay, picking apples and corn, an Indiana boy who'd wagoned west as far as he could go and settled down. Sometimes his own eyes followed the people of Sanel as if he wanted to chuck it all and walk with them to the sea.

The Day the Drought Ended

Step by crooked step
I make my way into the creek's bed where it sang so loud last winter.
Sponge of detritus
laced by roots and rocks, parched bank furrowed, gray.
A lizard skitters off.
At bottom, bedrock.
How many searching rains it took to find a truth that dry.

I lean to touch upended boulders whose tremendous water-rolling trembled me at night.
Tympani strewn careless in a pit, the player gone. I climb back up with music in my head.

February on the Mountain

Alder's wind-mauled catkins rub their furry backs against blue sky while earth still huddles under last week's coat of snow.
All's bare and strange, the indigo naked, frail, its summer leaflets gone.
Manzanita bears a few waxy, heart-shaped buds like embryos.
Spring wounds me with her buds. Why do I cling to every sign of her rebirth?

Petals in the snow, half-frozen roses bigger than my fist.
I place my fingers in the print of the predator who comes to breathe cold breath upon my neck in dreams:
winter, with its cougar eyes, silent, watchful, deadly, merciful.

The Change

I note the classic signs: anxiety, body's thermostat gone mad.
It's not the sweat I mind but the long chill that follows.
And this indignity: I'm helpless as a pregnant woman. Children came alive in that dark cell. Now age stirs its fragile bones.

What will it be, this wrinkled babe?
It will have my eyes, but shall I recognize its hair?
And who will want it in his bed on even the coldest night?
It may inherit something of my mind, but O the discipline it must endure.

A Stone for My Father

Sitting across from me at the breakfast table, his hair as silver as my mother's rings, he tells about the good times:
gathering agates on the beach, coming back to the trailer in the evening, sitting with my mother, sorting stones.
Her piano sits in the rock room under plastic, its laughter and its fury silenced. The cup trembles in his hands.
I think about the years he spent with her, second husband, honest but rough-spoken, fisherman to her fire-opal moods.

Gradually he sifts through the rubble of a marriage that, if not quite happy, lasted.
I wonder if it often comes to this, talking with someone in a sheltered space while you sort whatever stones you've gathered, turn them one by one, note their color, weigh them in your hands, and give them names.

Again

Earth revolves. We on the daystar side grip her like animals, cling to our mother's fur, afraid she'll shake us off at the next turn.
She has places to go, appointments with planets.
We are only her latest litter.
However we try we can never be as all-sufficient as she, can never possess that lovely horizon, that interstellar glow, those magnificent blue depths swarming with life.

We hesitate to feel for beginnings.
What worlds can we become? Shall we toss our children aside so casually?

In Sheep's Clothing

You are surprised that I'm a Leo.
I see—as if some English inn with weak tea and lumpy beds masqueraded under the royal sign.

But think of all the lions that there are:
patient ones with dull coats islanded in zoos, in rings, cowed by whips and ordinary chairs;
lionesses programed by the pride, compelled to hunt but giving up the catch;
she-cougars traveling by night, alone in the remotest places.

Looking through heavy bars, my Aries friend,
I wonder whether I could let you out, race you to the cliffs to feel the wind and contemplate the world from a new height.
What do you suddenly see in my eyes that makes you so afraid?

Beware Blackberries Bearing Gifts

Reaping what I once unwisely sowed, I hoe what threatens to invade my garden, undermine the road, and rule the world.
I can't believe I nursed this vine through all those years of drought.
It first began to thrive the year I found its fruit all but inedible.

This serpent in our Eden marks my arms not with its juice but with my blood.
Its runners grip like death.
Only my glasses save my eyes. My breath fast as Laocoon's, grappling with snakes, I fight appalling life, afraid to call a truce until the last stubborn root is wrestled from the ground.

Ghosts

Yesterday we cut the apple tree.
I was surprised to see its insect-riddled wood amounted to a single pickup load.
I'd thought a thing that filled its living space with such solidity would last us till the spring, that what made tons of memorable fruit, tart-sweet, would give an equal heat.

Though it's but a stump, knee-high,
I image it with leaves against the sky, see in the moving cloud of smoke above my morning fire a shroud of blossoms. Will the deer look for windfalls here again next year?

Walking in October Woods

Because the only changeless law is change we know even love can't stay the same.
A planet born in fire cools to livability. Life tries one form for an age and then, when climates fail, trades it for another.
After all his false beginnings man came down from trees, walked upright, joined the tribe. His summer may have seemed as wonderful as ours, game plentiful, seeds ripe, berries rich on the tongue as lovers' kisses.

Delivered from necessity we walk
October woods, collecting winter fuel.
A fire tonight, a fire in the morning—it doesn't matter. We survive on memory of warmth as much as on the heat of fire itself.

Dividing Line

After a day of unexpected warmth we drive north again to see if summer still lingers by the river.
The heat is real enough, but sun goes earlier. Maples light their leaves among the evergreens. There is new carpet on the forest floor.

Scrambling down the bluff we find the bridge is out and wade to the beach through water colder by a few degrees.
Phoebes we knew as friends all summer regard us now as strangers here long past normal visiting hours.
Soon the gnomon of the canyon wall catches us with shadow on the sand.
We shiver, wading back to reality.
A heron rises, putting miles between himself and us.
Under tanbarks in deserted camps deer browse and gaze with distant eyes.

We eat in the dark, alone within the lantern's narrow glow, crawl into our bags and fall asleep.
Wake to the quiet drip of mist and lie there till the sun comes out to gild the red berries of madrone.
A maple leaf detaches at the stem and slowly spirals down.
How difficult it is to find the line between one season and another.
How difficult to document a leaf before it fades into winter ground.

Something Like November

We put down our tools and stop to rest.
Now that the bowsaw's rasp has ceased, how still it is. Dusty light filters through the trees. The forest listens for a sound small and far away as rain.

A winter wren slips in and out of shadow.
Light as a leaf, a hermit thrush flutters to the ground.
He cocks his tail, then lowers it, instinctive movement that confirms what kind of thrush he is. And he—what does he think of us?
That something like November in our blood compels us to gather our own wood?

Over the Pass

No place to go but down, we say it will be easy now, only a short romp home.
Lift each foot, let it fall forward with gravity.
Finish the rations,
empty the canteen.
Tonight we'll sleep
in a soft bed, and clean.

And shall we dream of clear streams and lakes, of herons in canyons?
The smell of kit-kit-dizze and the blue of penstemon?

We rest in the shade to measure the effect of so much walking, then shoulder our empty packs, taking a last look around.

Part II
Medicine Bundle

Medicine Bundle

1. Skin of Mole

This midnight moonlight fur—reversed, a wrinkled brown paper bag still bloodstained where the juice leaked through.
Salty smell of flesh,
stiff snout intact,
double strand of teeth
like grains of silica.
Outfacing palms a parody of mismatched gloves.
Helpless as a toy on earth, it slips like velvet through its runs below.
Eyeless, earless though it looks to my flawed vision, and its brain paid back to the dark, it watches, listens. May its progeny be nourished by the worm that feeds on me.

2. Bone of Bird

I eat another animal.
Before me, cleansed of flesh, its neckbones lie, assuming new identity: a pack of ghostly dogs, a mockery of predators escaped, ivory skulls with eyes of air, sharp prongs of horn.
One broken at the snout reveals a core like honeycomb.
I fit the puzzle of these bones together.
Small steps of logic, they ascend from where the body was

*

to where the brain.
I've eaten muscle, thrown to dogs the skin and flexible nerve cord that made sense of these holes.
Life has become invisible.
Where has the honey gone?

3. Cocoon

What has known the freedom of the sky ties its hammock to a tree, takes a cradle-basket's shape, assumes the color of earth.
Beneath the husk
of silver-brushed dull brown, folded wings, soft with power.
Or only an animal preserved, cured, at rest? In my hand it whispers emptiness.
Life has left it hanging high,
a medicine rattle in the wind.

Like Xeno's Turtle

Do you recall that first quantum leap across the chasm of complete unawareness of the other's life?

We have drawn close enough to hear each other breathe.

Yet each day, no matter what we will,
life lets us cover only half the distance that remains.

Act of Faith

When the house is quiet the stove and I open our doors to each other and stare into the heart of the fire.
Breathing aloud, making a few sharp taps (unsteady bursts like old typewriter keys) it subsides to coals, a drift of ash, ultimate reduction of a tree.

The appetite of my small firebox appalls me. It eats forests.
If times were hard, winter bitter, would I feed it the oak table that nourished me with food and talk?
Chairs whose arms held me lovingly?
Would I strip the bed and burn its antique cherry? Rip shelves apart, make an auto-da-fe of Rilke, Yeats, Donne and all the rest, Thomas Hardy blazing by Fielding's Tom, Bible fused in a pyre with Das Kapital?

Only in extremis I'd add the flutes.
With breath as quick to flare and die as mine they'd whisper one last pavane to pipe the household gods back to heaven.
I'd take an axe to walls and roof and then go down myself like Joan of Arc, some minor witch well-versed in ways beloved things are sacrificed to feed an insatiable flame.

The Abalone Heart

The stubborn muscle makes up its mind, fastens to an unresponsive rock.

Only iron pries it loose again.
Wrenched from its gritty will, thrown helpless in a sack,

it bumps to its destiny.

The empty shell still clings to a mother-of-pearl opinion.

After a lifetime in the dark, far from eyes that translate light, how does it dare to hazard this amazing rainbow?

Swimming Stony Creek

I watch as his world closes in:
town, garden, house, his room, the tired walls of his battered heart.
He won't go under easy. Each retreat's a well-planned skirmish in a battle.
Ordered to wear the oxygen's long leash, he orders more hose to make it longer.
Grimly he endures three days in a rest home to prove to me he's better off in his own.
He takes charge of his complex medication, three pills in the morning, five at night, three at 1 a.m., and, in between,
the sessions on the Bird breathing machine.
He manages to recruit two old women who come to clean house and fix meals.
One of them stands guard every night.
His line of communication's the telephone.

In spite of the close camp he's forced to keep,
he takes sudden forays into the woods.
He tells me about the time he was a boy hiking in winter hills west of the ranch when, rather than go back two miles to a bridge, he tossed his rock-tied clothes to the other shore and swam Stony Creek in January, breaking ice with his hands at every stroke.

Ceremonial Basket

First the gathering: she digs sedge and bulrush roots where the river overflowed.
Cuts willow shoots and redbud when her fingers tell her to.
She cleans, splits, coils, finds quail topknot feathers, abalone shell.

She waits for the dream.
Suddenly one day
her hands begin to move.
Do the wild roots
remember where they grew?
Design comes forth,
part butterfly, part snake.
It takes a long time,
from leafing out to acorn gathering.

What will it hold?
Seeds, she says.
Clamshell beads.
An offering to God.
That is all.

Place Names

They wait for me to notice them on maps, those little towns with names like Eminence, New Harmony, and Hopewell.
Once I came across a place called Friend, hardly a settlement, only a box for mail out on a windswept Oregon plateau.
The man who lived there made canoes, painted them with Indian designs for folks who floated down the Crooked River.

In dreams I float halfway between Responsibility and Freedom. The first is solid, full of love; but it is walled.
The second's a direction, not a town—somewhere downstream on the Lonely River.

Staying Warm

Waking early on a winter day, thinking of warmer places I have been,
I feed the fire, trying to persuade the mercury past sixty, remember cold mornings when we woke to feed the children, how our lives revolved like two dutiful planets around a house, a garden, and a world I still sometimes dream of.

Now we live solitary in the hills.
You no longer spend your days at work.
Discipline fails, we forget to wind the clock, yard and house are a clutter of undone chores, we never gather enough wood for winter.
Instead we wander through the woods looking for manzanita or calypso, any sign of spring. Moving keeps us warm, and fallen wood of trees that soaked up sunlight all those years we hardly noticed that it fell on us.

Whale Watch at Bodega Head

How the wind cuts through the layers we put on this morning when we crept from warm beds, trailing dreamweeds, leaving our lives to stand at the edge of one element and gaze into another. What are we looking for in the fogged water?
Before it gets too cold to stay, we want an answer. Among the rocks waves surge, swirling green and white.
Gulls ride invisible currents, light farther down the bluff. This could be the headland where Coyote stood to toss in the log the old ones say became your living body.

Wind stiffens, driving us to seek shelter and hot tea. As we turn away, someone shouts, "She blows!" Over the sea a white breath plumes the air, plumes it again, again. A shining black body breaches, flukes rise and you go down. My blood races to follow your warm blood into the depths, into the dimmer light.
Cousin, though we may never meet or touch, to share the same world and time is miracle enough.

Hazel

We trudge up the canyon to look for wood and find hazel nuts on slender shrubs just a little higher than our heads.
The leaves are soft and delicately scented;
the husks leave nettles in our fingers.
As a child I always confused the hazel nut with my cousin Hazel who lived in the woods and knew the name of every herb and what it cured—infection, fever, pain.
She used to witch wells for local ranchers until she got too old and cross and strange.

Already next year's growth begins to form, catkins pendent, wormlike, from scaly buds.
When nuts are out of reach, we bend the stems, so flexible when young, their forks noted for responsiveness to water.
In a little while we have a handful of bony, crisp kernels rich as butter.
We forget the wood. It doesn't matter.
We often set out to look for one thing and end by coming home with another.

Elegy for Young Firs

One by one the young firs come down.
With hardly a tremor they submit to the chainsaw's loud bite.
Branches interlaced, they wait as if they do not fully understand.
We tell them with a tug.
Obedient to the wedge of air we've cut, they fall across the road.
In the sudden silence we are glad they missed the roof, the power line, the things we planned to save. Now the windows and the shrubs below will get more light, the house will be safer if the nearby forest burns.
We know a dozen reasons, all good, for having made this change.

Still, we pause a moment, not quite sure.
A quarter-century of growth is gone in seconds at our hands. The raw space needs to be explained before we turn our minds to other things.

Part III

Sleeping on the Terminal Moraine

The Salamander

Mottled as the leaves, it lay motionless.
Its tapered, brown body seemed carved from stone, the skin drawn tight over a bony skull.
The filmed, protuberant eyes were those of a thing born in the dark.
Traveling slowly with the chill that creeps from the redwood canyon into the oak woodland in December, it had crawled from the creek bottom just as its ancestor, Diplovertebron, once crawled from the sea.

I knelt to pick it up.
Cold and heavy as a monument, it switched its body back and forth, hands and feet and elbows working hard, giving a glimpse of marbled underparts creekwater gray.
Its rough, sticky skin slimed my glove.
I put it down. It twitched away on its annual trek to the top of the ridge—ancient winter, ascendant on my hill.

Volume 99

One day my road will be impassable.
Slides on the grade, bridge out, no trail that even a deer could navigate.
Lines down, no phone, lights, heat or running water.
I'll slog through rainsoaked woods breaking off small dead branches, burn them at night to keep warm, pick winter cress and lamb's quarters, dig the bulb called Indian Potato, fight gray squirrels for the hazel nuts, talk to birds and trees and salamanders, having no other live companionship.
When the vireo whistles, I'll disinter my rosewood recorder and play a kind of minor counterpoint, not, as in the old days, madrigals, but a weird new music all my own, music to be alone by on my hill.

Then will you sit on the other side wondering: does she survive, is she ill or well, does she have food, is her water pure, her Zinfandel gone, is she still reading the Great Books . . .

Sawtooth

Old granite edge, old fractured bone jutting from the body of the mountain, you cut your shape on the diamond air.
Polished steel at dawn, by noon dazzling white, when fire builds along the western sky you absorb its rosy, dusty heat as if you couldn't bear to let it go.
Earth goes dark, sky pales and cools, still you hold that warmth like an ember, hold it as the first stars wink on.
Only then I shift my gaze to contemplate Vega and Altair, to trace the Dipper's pointers to Polaris, constant, faint above the canyon rim.

When I look back the alpenglow is gone.
Only a ghostly phosphorescence sighs around you in the wash of stars.
I lie in a high mountain meadow accustoming my eyesight to the dark, looking away from any earthly light, waiting for what comes next to begin.
Waiting for Cassiopeia in her chair.

Changing

It happens quietly. A maple seed blown here by a sudden, random wind sprouts beneath the bedroom wall, grows before I quite know how it grew, tops the eaves, seeking afternoon as well as morning sun, and fills my life.
Leaves unfold like ragged green umbrellas waiting for an April rain.

I tell myself it's just another tree that could have been dug up when it was small and planted farther from the house.
If I don't cut it soon, if I keep on watching while it reaches for the sky, delighting in its gray, sinewy trunk, the soft touch of leaves when I walk by, the way it gathers light on winter days and pours it generously through the glass, it won't be long until it moves my house off its foundation.

The room is full of curious, precious things, skin of mole, hawk feathers, moth cocoons, deer's-foot rattle, dry seed pods of zygadene, racemes of saxifrage.
And now across the walls maple leaves sign to me in shadows. Though the tree is not yet in the room, in the dark I hear it whisper, know it's coming in.

Petitioning

All afternoon I sit in a shopping mall gathering signatures to Save Our Farmlands.
Under the tile, under the parking lot is earth once rooted with an orchard whose clean fragrance I remember well.

Warmed by the mock sunshine of windows blooming with towels, dishes, comforters, herds of human cattle drift across a tile floor like the grid of subdivisions.
Stunted trees uniformly sprout from planters, imitation wooden lamp posts grow between the benches. Far above sky and cloud snow through tinted glass like bad reception on TV. Immaculate cleaning men with chromed carts spray the tired air with apple blossom.

Putting the Garden to Bed

Mid-October. The weatherman predicts dropping temperatures, snow level at two thousand feet.
Every year I face the same dilemma: put the garden down cleanly, like an old dog? or wait till every fruit is stiff with frost?
This year I'll put the soil to sleep, sow it with a cover crop of rye, bury it under a blanket of manure.
I pull down beans, pick tomatoes green, rip the stout vines up. I thought after I set them out they'd never grow.
Roots were busy with a feast I hadn't faith to set the table for.

A light rain has left the earth soft enough to turn. An old gravedigger bending to my task, I shovel myself warm. When I stop the sun's behind the firs. I'm cold.
It's later than I thought.

The Day the Clock Stopped

Overcome by age, the electric clock finally stops at twenty after four.
Ailing—or dead? Trying to make it live,
I jiggle its brittle loops of wire.
In rigor mortis the hands remain folded, one over the other.
As if preparing a body for the grave,
I carefully wash the clock, wash the dark spot it left upon the wall, a shadow that refuses to disperse.
Strung on habit, my eyes return to it as they used to turn to Mother's chair.
Should I be hungry? Is the moussaka done?
Isn't it time, now, to go to bed?
For weeks I am not quite able to operate without that plain face, those sure hands to tell me what to do.

Then one day my eyes become windows revealing how time passes away without sound, without visible movement.
The tanbark oak has grown a green halo.
Light climbs daily to the tips of firs, every tree creates its annual ring.
That night I stare beyond the galaxy into depths where distant stars reach toward earth from time out of mind.

At the Planning Commission

That it should come to this—that we movers of earth, cutters of trees, polluters of springs and streams should sit in a heated public room deciding where fences shall be run over the unresisting land, decreeing where power lines shall go and houses of the rich be planted!
In the beam of the overhead projector a French-curve map stains the wall, lots laid out like steaks and chops on a butcher's cutting chart.
I've seen this mountain in another light, toothed with the quiet symmetry of firs, after a night when deer and fox and owl fed and went to sleep, coyote's song brought the dark alive and skunk left a subtle warning on the wind.

Restlessly I cross my legs, uncross them.
I have had my say. Now it is up to the five behind microphones at the front of the room, visibly tired, thinking of dinner, craving a cigarette, a coffee break.
I forgot to tell them about the salamanders, dark as chocolate, torpid with cold, that move up the mountain about this time every year, how easy it is to drive right over them if you are unaware.
I forgot to tell them about the golden eagle that clings to the top of the transmission tower, feathers in blue air, talons clutching metal, half in his world, half in one we made.

Joy

Surveying my garden in a dry spring, peppers retarded, tomatoes anemic, peas rushing to tough pod, squash an unknown quantity for summer, artichoke (only one) peering up spitefully through gray spikes, insects ominous, each a potential disaster, my eye falls at last on the young uncomplicated lettuce, yellow-green, bursting the bounds of its modest bed, holding back nothing for tomorrow, insisting it be eaten now, enjoyed at once and to the full without thought, without plan, fruit of a careless handful of seed thrown out on winter ground, needing only a small rain, a bit of sun, and a great appetite for what is alive and can be taken on the spot, an excess to be given freely away!

The Careful Years

Halfway through June of a year when rain stopped early and Farewell-to-Spring rushed to seed, I wake and hear vireos, song sparrows, spotted towhees.
The sun will soon be up again, and hot, wilting leaves, turning them dry and brown, threatening my own skin. How careful we learn to be if we survive past sixty to shield ourselves from too much sun, to exercise enough to keep the heart circulating blood through arteries to brains that more and more refuse to yield up memory at will. All week I have tried to learn to hate you because I need you and you stay away and never call or write even though once I thought we were the best of friends.
That was before I learned to be careful whom I cared about, or why. Dear God, if I must now always choose the sensible shoe, the diet of less red meat, let me at least abandon care in dreams, where there should be no dry season, ever.

Ano Nuevo

Curious how we choose the shortest days, the longest nights to begin again, to look like Janus backward, forward.

Why not July, afternoons warm and long, the nights to come soft and wrapped in flowers?

So many difficulties wait for winter, wishful hearing, all but vanished sight, the not-to-be-depende-upon body, foolishness, failures of compassion, past tenderness like dead bouquets, memory confused by many summers.

Then we hope for less and less:
no longer for a world at peace, only for a world not quite at war;

not for a presence, but perhaps a letter; instead of a true vision, a momentary glimpse of light through a prism.

No wonder we dream of another hemisphere where blindfold angels break pinatas, causing an excited scramble.

Going Away: an Ode to the House

As if performing a burial ritual, we provision the van with food, music, whatever we might need where we are going.
We pause, suddenly more in love than ever with the familiar walls that hem us in, orb weavers' webs above the doors, mud-daubers' nests under the eaves, conduits of carpenter bees in the siding.
Inside, the worn Chinese rugs, purples and blues still rich and beautiful, sturdy, battered furniture handed down for generations, light shining through blue and amber and green bottles, pretty junk beside incredible treasures, fossils and dried flowers and roadside weeds, drawings of native plants and blue herons, a carved one taking flight from the piano, the warm, comfortered bed, the cold mirror, its dream-trees lashed by wind.

When we are gone, the lichens on that fir will reflect light in this particular way, bracken ferns will flicker like green flames, the salamander will leave the box he's under to wander back to the creek and breed more young.
The thrush that haunts shadows near the house will stay or not, be eaten by cats or sing all summer, the small flycatcher may return to the nest, red columbine will bloom or die, and the young maple will probably top the ridgepole. The creek, reduced from basso profundo to busy chatter, will run out of things to say in April and lapse into its annual summer silence.
Before we even leave for our winter trip,
I catch myself longing for our return.

Lesson One

The smallest flycatcher, the Empidonax, chose to build her nest on the rolled-up blind above the door.
It suffers a minor earthquake each time we enter or leave the house.
Still, the site has advantages:
it is well hidden from jays;
for a perch, the clothesline's handy, and the slim branches of the maple that grows outside the window.
I watch her from there sometimes.
She hops, nervous, from branch to branch, flipping her tail for balance.
She stares with enormous eyes set in a small, pointed head, looking not too bright, terribly suspicious, like some humans I know who have no more reason to trust God than she to trust me. For am I not one of the breed that levels land and destroys trees, that burns forests and drives other creatures out to protect cats and roses?
That starves its young, betrays its kind, and blows up great parts of the world where birds will sing no more?
That devises cunning cruelties for reasons no one understands?
My complex hands could unroll the blind to let her eggs tip out and smash, toss her nest into the fire or save it to show the children.

Day by day the maple leaves reach to shelter the nest.
Quietly I creep in and out to hang my wash at the line's end.
She sits on the nest doggedly, taking a chance, tail raised

*

like a tiny flag of truce.
Together we grow into a web, fragile, dangerous, but with a design that slowly etches into our memories.
Something we could make happen again.

Sleeping on the Terminal Moraine

An avalanche of moonlight buries the stars, frosts the domes, whitens the sandy road.
Where I sleep—or rather, where I lie, moonrise-to-moonset lover of this place, breathing in its monardella scent, learning the texture of its granite skin, memorizing every cleft and line, too delirious to close my eyes—where I lie is where a glacier paused.
Now the moraine has grown itself a cover, a species of willow, creeping manzanita, mountain heather, buckwheat, penstemon.

The moon sets, the stars revive, and one planet, the brightest object in the sky, shines with a reassuring steadiness.
Still, after the moon's warm alpenglow, these new fires seem cold and far away, may not be there at all, may only be chips in the universal memory.

Earth continues rolling eastwardly, my transient breath is swept swiftly by, gradually the sky begins to pale.
Determined to catch nature in the act,
I concentrate upon a visible star, lose and find, lose and find again.
A sudden wind ruffles the tallest fir—or is it the birds waking all at once?
In the second it takes to look and look back the star is gone. I have fallen for the oldest trick of all, sleight of hand.

The sun wakes me, hot on my face.
I will be your permanent star, it says,

*

you can count on me. I will be back every day for a few more million years and faithfully hide myself from you each night so you won't tire of me or burn your eyes with too much ardent staring. You are the one who will pale and fade away and disappear.

Part IV
Exploring Death Valley

Moving

You rush to catch a bus or plane, not looking back, not wanting to.
The room you leave was only a place to make the best of, a body inherited from some unknown ancestor, too large or small for your dreams.
Later you recall an accident, empty hangers jangling in a closet, a song they played that year on the radio, a quarrel, green bottles in the window, source of all the room's light and dust.
A silence not quite like any other.

You drive at dusk along a winter highway, see small houses near the road, each spilling its light like a lamp.
Briefly you wonder what goes on inside, people making love or quarreling, rooted there or waiting to move on like the restless stranger passing by.

In a cabin high on the mountain someone reads or writes or plays the piano, simply alone, content to be alone.
Before you reach this altitude how many lonely miles you have to drive between one empty room and another

Dirge for Submersible Pump

The pump went out today.
Over the spot where it is buried
I listen for its rhythm.
I took that steady throb for granted.
Strange to open the tap and hear a ghostly sigh, the last breath of an entity that made life possible, voice of a rusty artery through which vital fluid flowed to the circulatory system of my house.
How long such water lies beneath the ground is anyone's guess—long enough to absorb iron and calcium from rock and suspend it in a rich brew that stains sinks and clogs plumbing.

Deep under the earth in an aquifer where storms of winters past gather, gather and flow, a hidden river accessible only through a strenuous effort, an act of faith, like some difficult love we cannot see but must believe is there because instinct forks us to it.
For that water we spend all we have even though we know that it can leave a taste of earth and iron in our mouths.

Kneeling by a Raised Bed

Crumbling moist soil into loam, surprising pink and purple worms half-in, half-out of tunnels, I sense that caring for this earth, this small piece of world I've come to love, may be as close to prayer as I can get.
Here I admit no man-made machines to tear the quiet or the soil apart.
The silence of my single presence draws to the compost pile a mild towhee poking patiently to fill her needs like a bag lady in a garbage dump, draws a sparrow to light above my head and sing to life's perennial return.
Bowing over a handful of earth,
I smell the rich complexities of mold, of mysteries I'll never understand—worlds within worlds within my hand.

Pinnacle Gulch, Minus Tide

The sea withdraws, defenses down, secrets open on the strand.
Black rocks, shiny-wet, studded with snails, limpets, barnacles. Muddy forests of sea anemones absorbing food in blue-green jelly mouths.
Sea palm in slippery clumps, orange, red, and purple stars.
A hermit crab waves its legs from an oliva shell.

We see a worn tire wedged between two rocks, seaweed twined around a yellow plastic rope, bits of green and brown bottles ground to a smooth edge, ships' spars with rusty spikes, beer cans, a few odd shoes.
Knowing the absentminded sea will soon rush back to claim its abandoned treasures, reluctantly we trudge to shore, adding our temporary tracks to those of sanderlings and gulls.

Sailing Around Angel Island

The island was there, but the angels were absent, on a journey, perhaps, to another sphere, anyway, nowhere to be seen on or off the mound of brown land looming ahead.
No angels, either, in the sky. Only gulls teetering on bent wings, making the most of a weak breeze that barely puffed our sails.
Between turns at the tiller, which trembled slightly at the sluggish sucking of a current in the straits, we probed the opaque water with our eyes, wondering how deep it was, what lay beneath its gray-green skin. Seals that bobbed nearby could have told us, or pelicans gliding just above the waves, or the still heron fishing by the rocks.
But we were strangers here today and didn't speak the language. Not until we rounded the point, steering by Alcatraz, did we loosen lines and collapse our white wings—the closest things to angels we encountered.

Powerless now, we drifted on the bay, waiting for the motor to take hold.
A perpetual mirage, the gray city floated in the distance; two bridges fenced us into a calm pasture.
In that suspended space we felt spellbound, attuned to all that breathed below us and around us and above, sensitive to the slightest tremor, ready for some clear communication we sensed was imminent. Suddenly the motor started with a dry stutter.
In control again, we headed home,

*

thinking how journeys often differ from what we had expected them to be and end by bringing us back to ourselves.

Exploring Death Valley

1. Into the Dark

We step out of the van in Tehachapi, our feet on frozen ground.
Shivering in the motel's panel ray, we survey the dismal bed, crooked drapes, the tall, ornate lamp that won't light.
Prisoners' families and friends slept here, closed in by these walls.
All night freight trains lumber by,
shaking the earth under us and moaning.
We sleep like the dead in spite of everything.
When we travel on next day the Brandenburg effervesces on tape like a hidden spring.
Mountains close us off on the west, a blue wall with snow-spattered peaks.
Creosote bush, stiff Joshua tree seem at home on the rolling gray land.
Just as dark begins to settle down we reach the valley floor at Stovepipe Wells, a camp laid out in rows like a cemetery.
In winter old folks drag themselves here to join a climax population of ravens.

2. In the Rain Shadow

Salt flats, Bad Water, barren dunes—what am I doing here, why have I come, daughter of fog-shrouded coastal valleys?
So much sun hurts me, hurts my eyes.
Feeling its harsh touch through my shirt,
I seek out any bush or tree, even if it offers little shade.
At least my mind can focus on a few dry, leathery leaves or gray needles.
They say mesquite lives a thousand years, outlives animals that come and go.
What would it be like to be the oldest thing alive, to look

*

gray and motionless and dull while deep within your dry husk life ticked away the centuries?

3. Salt Creek

From dry earth it rises, disappears once again into dry earth.
Life forms of earlier times have vanished, all save one, the rare, endangered pupfish.
Here it survives, lurking under rocks, darting out to scare off other fish or feed on certain insects. Landlocked in less than three miles of shallow stream, it changed its needs to fit its circumstance, a world shrunk to a thin, salty thread.
I think of my father, breathing through a tube the precious oxygen his body craved, selling the boat he used to fish the lake.

4. Mirage

Hundreds of feet below the old surface, I creep like some salt-tolerant bug across the bed of a fossil lake, trying to remember ancient winds that slanted waves across an element where now ravens are the only swimmers.
As low here as I'll ever be,
I have no place to look but up, up the fault scarp at the water mark the level of the lake once reached, a dim record, nothing but a shadow.
Once I thought mountains never changed.
Now I face a block-faulting floor, hearts of mountains melting into fans, identical substance, ever-shifting form.
I stare for minutes at a mist rising, mist with its suggestion of a cool, gray coastal fog. Oh, heavenly!

*

I even start to taste its iodine breath when suddenly I realize Badwater has played a trick on me—not ocean mist, only reflected cloud! Furious, I dig my hands into the alkali and fling it into the air, making my own blinding, stifling cloud.
After the crashing in my ears subsides, faint laughter, trickling into the ground.
Oh God, if this is all there is,
let it at least be real.

5. Ghost Flowers

In spite of what they promised me, there are no flowers here.
It must be too early or too late.
Perhaps it was a dry winter.
In the desert seeds wait their chance, rush to sudden growth after a rain.
Some outwait a disappointing spring to germinate in fall. Others wait all their lives to come to life.
Ghost Flowers, Fivespot, Purple Mat—
I see them even when they are not here.
Or are they always here, like the stars, only the light hides them from our eyes?

6. The Castle

They are all dead now—the millionaire, his intellectual wife, the Indians, even the amusing scoundrel Scotty.
We wander through their lives like maggots, sucking on every sort of privacy.
Don't worry, Bessie, the heavy drapes are always drawn against the strong light; visitors are not allowed to tread on the handsome Spanish rugs or sit where once you and your guests sat, alive.

*

No one touches, ever, the grand pianos except to dust, except the female ranger who gives a white-gloved version of Chopin.
The redwood ceilings are lovely, I admit, although it makes me sad to know the trees were sacrificed to give acoustic pleasure to you who couldn't even play or sing.

But I forgive you. The Shoshone baskets lining the shelves of your sitting room shine like ancient sunlight through the minds and willow-wise hands of their makers.
In the dim light bulrush roots and stalks issue a tender fragrance. Chuckawalla and desert tortoise live in the designs.

Barbara Meyn was born in 1923 on her grandfather's farm south of Ukiah, California, into a family that had migrated from Maryland to Kentucky, Indiana, and Iowa before the westward movement carried it to the Pacific Coast in the 1850's.

Growing up in Ukiah and in Eureka, on the north coast, she attended Humboldt State College and University of California at Berkeley, where she received her B.A. in English and studied poetry composition with the late Josephine Miles.

At various times newspaperwoman, teacher, and free-lance writer, Barbara now lives on Humbug Creek in northeastern Sonoma County with her husband, a retired Santa Rosa Junior College vocal-choral instructor. They have two sons and three grandchildren.

Once an editorial assistant for Loon, Barbara presently helps edit Green Fuse, a poetry journal dedicated to the preservation of the planet. Her poems have appeared in several small magazines, and her self-published first book, Blue Heron on Humbug Creek, was printed in 1981 by Calliopeia Press. She has given readings at Santa Rosa Junior College and on radio KPFA in Berkeley.

Barbara has been an environmental activist for many years and helped to found the Environmental Center of Sonoma County.

Ahsahta Press

POETRY OF THE WEST

MODERN

- *Norman Macleod, Selected Poems
- Gwendolen Haste, Selected Poems
- *Peggy Pond Church, New & Selected Poems
- Haniel Long, My Seasons
- H. L. Davis, Selected Poems
- *Hildegard Flanner, The Harkening Eye
- Genevieve Taggard, To the Natural World
- Hazel Hall, Selected Poems
- Women Poems of the West: An Anthology*
- *Thomas Hornsby Ferril, Anvil of Roses
- *Judson Crews, The Clock of Moss
- Thomas Hornsby Ferril, Westering

CONTEMPORARY

- *Marnie Walsh, A Taste of the Knife
- *Robert Krieger, Headlands, Rising
- Richard Blessing, Winter Constellations
- *Carolyn Wright, Stealing the Children
- Charley John Greasybear, Songs
- *Conger Beasley, Jr. Over DeSoto's Bones
- *Susan Strayer Deal, No Moving Parts
- *Gretel Ehrlich, To Touch the Water
- *Leo Romero, Agua Negra
- *David Baker, Laws of the Land
- *Richard Speakes, Hannah's Travel
- Dixie Partridge, Deer in the Haystacks
- Philip St. Clair, At the Tent of Heaven
- Susan Strayer Deal, The Dark Is a Door
- Linda Bierds, Flights of the Harvest-Mare
- Philip St. Clair, Little-Dog-Of-Iron
- Corrinne Hales, Underground
- Howard W. Robertson, to the fierce guard in the Assyrian Saloon
- Wyn Cooper, The Country of Here Below
- George Perreault, Curved Like An Eye
- Donald Schenker, Up Here
- Barbara Meyn, The Abalone Heart

*Selections from these volumes, read by their authors, are available on The Ahsahta Cassette Sampler.

